The cruelty sufficient to authorize the granting of a divorce "implies either actual personal violence, or a reasonable apprehension of it, or such a course of treatment as endangers life or health and renders cohabitation unsafe." May v. May, 62 Pa. (12 P. F. Smith) 206, 210; Waldron v. Waldron, 24 Pac. 649, 650, 85 Cal. 251, 9 L. R. A. 487; Morris v. Morris, 14 Cal. 76, 77, 73 Am. Dec. 615; Butler v. Butler (Pa.) 1 Pars. Eq. Marsh.) 322, 323; Cline v. Cline, 10 Or. 474, 475. And the courts adjudge such a state of things a sufficient cause for a decree of separation on the ground that, in a state of personal danger, no duties to others can be perfectly performed, for the reason that under such circumstances the duty of self-preservation, which is primary in its commencement and paramount in obligation, is superior to the duties imposed by the marital connection, and, when called into action, is inconsistent with those duties and renders their discharge impossible." Rose v. Rose, 9 Ark. (4 Eng.) 507, 513. And such acts will constitute cruel and abusive treatment, within the meaning of a statute authorizing a divorce for such cruelty. Lyster v. Lyster, 111 Mass. 327, 329. And see, also, Williams v. Williams, 28 Pac. 726, 728, 1 Colo. App. 281; Sharman v. Sharman, 18 Tex. 521, 525. The denial of necessities and comforts by a husband to his wife, he having the means to furnish them, would certainly endanger her life and health, though done in the blindest manner. Butler v. Butler (Pa.) 1 Pars. Eq. Cas. 329, 344. Although the character of the ill treatment, whether it operates directly on the body or primarily upon the mind alone, and all the attending circumstances, are to be considered for the purpose of estimating the degree of the cruelty, yet the final test of sufficiency as a cause of divorce must be its actual or reasonably apprehended injurious effect upon the body or health of the complaining party. Waldron v. Waldron, 24 Pac. 649, 650, 85 Cal. 251, 9 L. R. A. 487.

A good definition of cruelty is the infliction of great pain or misery without necessity. Judge v. State, 58 Ala. 402, 403.

"Sævitia," of the English law, or "cruel treatment," as it is known in our own, has been defined by the Supreme Court. In the earliest case, that of Head v. Head, 2 Ga. 191, the court held that the English law, as construed by the courts of that country, prevailed in this state, and that only for the causes prescribed by the common law, as of force in England at that time, could divorces be granted here, and the court said: "In determining what is sævitia by the ecclesiastical law, it has been adjudged to be necessary that there should be a reasonable apprehension of bodily hurt. The causes must be grave and weighty, and show a state of personal danger, incompatible with the duties of married life." This conclusion was distinctly upheld by Smith v. Smith, 84 Ga. 440, 11 S. E. 496, 8 L. R. A. 362, and was announced to be the law in Georgia until Act Feb. 22, 1850. Cruel treatment, within the meaning of Civ. Code 1895, § 2427, is the willful infliction of pain, bodily or mental, upon the complaining party, such as reasonably justifies an apprehension of danger to life, limb, or health. Ring v. Ring, 44 S. E. 861, 862, 118 Ga. 183, 62 L. R. A. 878 (citing Odom v. Odom, 36 Ga. 286).

Cruelty is such conduct in one of the married parties as endangers, either apparently or in fact, the physical safety or health of the other to a degree rendering it physically or mentally impracticable for the endangered party to discharge properly the duties imposed by the marriage. Sharp v. Sharp, 16 Ill. App. (16 Bradw.) 348, 349 (citing Bish. Mar. & Div. [5th Ed.] 717); Small v. Small, 57 Ind. 568, 569; Beckley v. Beckley, 31 Pac. 470, 471, 23 Or. 226. See, also, McMahan v. McMahan, 40 Atl. 795, 797, 186 Pa. 485, 41 L. R. A. 802; Atteberry v. Atteberry, 8 Or. 224, 225, 229; Knight v. Knight, 31 Iowa, 451, 456; Close v. Close, 24 N. J. Eq. (9 C. E. Green) 338, 339. It is the willful, persistent causing of unnecessary suffering, whether in realization or apprehension, whether of body or mind, in such a way as to render cohabitation dangerous and unendurable. Gardner v. Gardner, 58 S. W. 342, 343, 104 Tenn. 410, 78 Am. St. Rep. 924. It is the wrongful act or acts plainly subversive of the marriage relation, and making it impossible that the duties of married life may be properly discharged. Uhlmann v. Uhlmann (N. Y.) 17 Abb. N. C. 236.

Conduct which produces perpetual social sorrow, although there be no actual physical cruelty, will constitute cruel and inhuman treatment, justifying divorce. Rice v. Rice, 6 Ind. 100, 105.

The ecclesiastical courts of England held that, in order to justify the granting of a divorce on the ground of cruel treatment, there must be danger of life, limb, or health. However, in many of the cases, they define acts as cruel which they regard as insufficient to authorize a divorce, because not amounting to personal violence or reasonable apprehension thereof. But in Georgia the statute itself provides that, in case of cruel treatment of one toward the other party, the jury may, according to the circumstances of the case, determine whether the divorce shall be from the bonds of matrimony or from bed and board; and cruel treatment, under this statute, consists in any act intended to torment, vex, or afflict, or which actually torments, vexes, or afflicts, without necessity, or any act of inhumanity, wrong, apprehension, or injustice. In accordance with this definition, where a husband took his young wife home; left her alone through a severe illness, while he engaged in dissipation; refused to let her attend the church of which she was a member; though rich, refused to give her the common necessities of wearing apparel; not only refused to punish a negro who had been grossly insolent and insubordinate to her in his absence, but approved of the conduct; disposed of his estate by will to his relatives, leaving her only a small sum; sent back to her father a family of negroes sent him as a gift; refused to let her stay any longer in the house, but drove her out in illness to wander where she might; and refused to acknowledge her child as his own—such conduct constituted cruelty, and would constitute cruelty, though it did not endanger the physical safety of the wife. Myrick v. Myrick, 67 Ga. 771, 775.

The phrase "cruelty of treatment," in Acts 1841, c. 262, § 3, relating to divorce, is to be construed as having the same meaning as that attributed to it by the ecclesiastical courts of England, and which has been given in equivalent language in the statutes of New York. Tayman v. Tayman, 2 Md. Ch. 393, 399.

Under the statute providing for divorce, the conduct or treatment complained of must be so cruel and inhuman as to make it unsafe for the wife to continue under the husband's power and dominion, or such indignities must be offered to her person as to render her condition so intolerable that she is forced to withdraw from his house. This strong language is not intended to apply to cases where a wife permits herself to become very unhappy and dissatisfied with her condition, by magnifying the faults and indiscretions of her husband. It could not have been intended, as it is inconsistent with the force of the words used by the Legislature, that every fault or indiscretion, or even wrong, on the part of the husband, which, owing to the greater refinement or peculiar taste and habits of the wife, caused her to feel that her situation was intolerable, should be the ground of the divorce. It must not only appear to the court that she considered it unsafe and improper for her to continue under the control of her husband, but it must appear from the facts that the causes set forth in the statute really existed for such feelings and conclusions; that is, the wrong complained of must be cruel and inhuman, or the indignity to her person so great as to force her to withdraw from him, because her condition is not to be endured, in consequence of such maltreatment. Shell v. Shell, 34 Tenn. (2 Sneed) 716, 722.

Treatment which, considered in its entirety, is sufficient to make the plaintiff apprehensive of her personal safety, and is of a nature calculated to affect her mind, undermine her health, and thereby endanger her life, constitutes cruel and inhuman treatment. Ryan v. Ryan, 47 Pac. 101, 30 Or. 226.

If a husband inflict on his wife, by force or violence, bodily pain or suffering, and especially degrading pain or suffering, such as cowhiding or whipping, this would be cruel treatment. Gholston v. Gholston, 31 Ga. 625, 628.

"The complaint in the bill is cruelty on the part of the husband towards the wife; but the record does not show that degree of extreme and repeated cruelty which the statute requires to authorize a decree for a divorce for that cause. That the husband was unkind in his treatment and tyrannical in his disposition is most likely true, but there was no personal violence shown. * * * The marriage should not be dissolved for light and trivial causes; and parties should not be encouraged by our decisions to come into court and ask for a divorce, unless they can show such a cause as the law requires." Vignos v. Vignos, 15 Ill. (5 Peck) 186, 187.

The expression "cruel and inhuman treatment," as used in the Revised Statutes, specifying cruel and inhuman treatment by the husband as a ground for divorce, is a synonymous and convertible term with "such conduct on the part of the husband toward his wife as may render it unsafe and improper for her to cohabit with him," which is also given as a ground for divorce. Mason v. Mason (N. Y.) 1 Edw. Ch. 278, 291.

It is difficult to define with precision what is and what is not extreme and repeated cruelty. In Poor v. Poor, 8 N. H. 307, 29 Am. Dec. 664, it is said, with perhaps sufficient accuracy, that "any willful misconduct of the husband, which endangers the life or health of the wife, which exposes her to bodily hazard and intolerable hardship, and renders cohabitation unsafe, is extreme cruelty, and in order to amount to such cruelty it is not necessary that there should be many acts." Hence, where there were four or five distinct assaults and batteries committed by a husband upon his wife, apparently without provocation, and in addition to this almost constant insult and abuse for a period of three years, terminating in separation, a decree was authorized on account of such cruelty. Ward v. Ward, 103 Ill. 477, 484.

Cruel and barbarous treatment, and indignities to the person, endangering life or health, must consist of willful and malicious acts, or they would not come within the description of the terms. "Cruel and barbarous" are words implying a merciless and savage disposition, taking pleasure in suffering, and without pity, while "Indignities" involves an insulting and contemptuous purpose. The evil and malicious will must be present to constitute an act cruel or barbarous, and insulting intent to make it an indignity. Accidental acts, no matter how injurious, would not be sufficient; for the wrongful intent would be absent. For this reason, therefore, insanity, also, would deprive the conduct of that element of willful purpose necessary to sustain the statutory cause of divorce. The proof, however, must establish such a mental condition as deprived the party of the use of his reason to the extent that he did not know right from wrong, and was incapable of willing the one or the other. In short, the proof must establish insanity; such insanity as, if the party were indicted for the same act as a crime, would be a good defense. Hansell v. Hansell, 3 Pa. Dist. R. 724.

A suit for divorce on the ground of cruelty is substantially a proceeding quia timet. The court interferes, not so much to punish an offense already committed, as to relieve the plaintiff from an apprehended danger. Bish. Mar. & Div. 456. The law does not require many acts of cruelty. One is enough, if it induces the court to think that the wife is in danger of bodily harm. Id. 465. In Massachusetts the language used in their statute is the same as in ours—"extreme cruelty." It must be bodily harm, and not mere mental suffering, to answer the language of the statute; but, as has been before remarked, it is not to punish acts of personal violence, actually committed, that the court interferes, but to afford protection from future injury. Cook v. Cook, 11 N. J. Eq. (3 Stockt.) 193, 197, 198.

Acts of violence by a husband toward his wife, in resisting her attempts to prevent him from using morphine, do not constitute extreme cruelty, within the meaning of Rev. St. c. 40, § 1, making extreme and repeated cruelty cause for divorce. Youngs v. Youngs, 22 N. E. 806, 808, 130 Ill. 230, 6 L. R. A. 548, 17 Am. St. Rep. 313.

Cruelty, sufficient to authorize a divorce, is shown by evidence that the husband struck the wife in the face, choked her, pulled her hair, threatened to whip her in the presence of a slave, whom he ordered to bring switches for the purpose, threw a mug at her with such force that it was shattered into atoms against the wall by the force of the blow, and beat her in the face with his fist until one-third part of her face was black and blue. Turner v. Turner, 44 Ala. 437, 445.

If the conduct of the husband is shown to be habitually cruel, indifferent, rude, ferocious, vulgar, obscene, and profane toward the wife, and she is seen, shortly after being with him, in tears, with bruises on her face, lips, and a contused wound on her side of a serious character, which lasted two months, and the husband admits, when complained of, that these indications of bad treatment were produced by him, his explanation that they were given in playfulness and jest, and not in anger and in earnest, will not be sufficient to rescue his conduct from the construction that these appearances are evidences of legal cruelty sufficient to justify a divorce in favor of the wife for that cause, under Rev. Code, § 2356, allowing a divorce for the cause of cruelty, when the husband has committed actual violence on the person of the wife, attended with danger to life or health, or when, from his conduct, there is reasonable apprehension of such violence. Goodrich v. Goodrich, 44 Ala. 670, 675.

Violent, scandalous conduct of a husband, when drunk, toward a wife of unexceptionable deportment, though he is good-natured and kind occasionally, when sober, sometimes assaulting in a violent manner an amiable and inoffensive wife, sometimes promising reformation, and caressing her with an imploring but transient fondness, so that under the dominion of such husband the wife would have no hope of being either happy or altogether safe, establishes a case of that kind of severity or cruelty denominated "sævitia," and which, according to the civil law and the spirit and object of the statute of 1800 of this state, will authorize a decree for alimony. Lockridge v. Lockridge, 33 Ky. (3 Dana) 28, 29, 28 Am. Dec. 52.

Abusive language or indignities.

Cruel and abusive treatment, within Act March 13, 1883, c. 212, authorizing the granting of divorce for such treatment, does not require actual violence, but words and deportment may be sufficient. Holyoke v. Holyoke, 6 Atl. 827, 828, 78 Me. 404.

Under a statute making cruel and inhuman treatment a ground for separation between husband and wife, proof of continued verbal outrages is sufficient. Fitzpatrick v. Fitzpatrick, 47 N. Y. Supp. 737, 21 Misc. Rep. 378.

The cruelty that authorizes a divorce is anything that tends to bodily harm and that thus renders cohabitation unsafe, or, as expressed in the older decisions, that involves danger of life, limb, or health. There may be cases in which the husband, without violence, actual or threatened, may make the marriage state impossible to be endured. There may be angry words, coarse and abusive language, humiliating insults, and annoyances in all the forms that malice can suggest, which may as effectually endanger life or health as personal violence, and which, therefore, would afford ground for relief by the court; but what merely wounds the feelings, without being accompanied by bodily injury or actual menace, does not amount to legal cruelty. Latham v. Latham (Va.) 30 Grat. 307, 320, 321; Myers v. Myers, 6 S. E. 630, 632, 83 Va. 806; Butler v. Butler (Pa.) 1 Pars. Eq. Cas. 329, 339, 344.

Cruelty on the part of a husband, so as to be a ground of divorce for his wife, should be construed to include cursing and swearing at her, and calling her vile and wicked names; she being a sensitive woman, of good taste, culture, and refinement. Warner v. Warner, 20 N. W. 557, 558, 54 Mich. 492.

It has uniformly been held in this state that mere language, however opprobrious or insulting, will not justify even strangers beating each other, and certainly the rule ought not to be relaxed as between husband and wife. To allow the husband to beat his wife into submission or to correct her delinquencies would be a return to the barbarism of the old common law, and make the wife the mere vassal or slave of the husband. Where the proof discloses acts of personal violence inflicted by the defendant on his wife, and of gross insults to her, such acts constitute cruel and inhuman treatment, notwithstanding the fact that she has used opprobrious and insulting language toward him. Wessels v. Wessels, 28 Ill. App. 253, 257.

"Cruel treatment does not always consist of actual violence. There are words of false accusation that inflict deeper anguish than physical injuries to the person, more enduring and lacerating to the wounded spirit of a gentle woman than actual violence to the person, though severe." Opprobrious epithets used by a husband toward his wife are abusive treatment. Farnham v. Farnham, 73 Ill. 497, 500.

The term "cruel," when used in the term "cruel and inhuman treatment" as a cause for divorce, is very broad, and includes more than personal violence. Thus, angry words and abusive language, grossly intemperate habits, etc., might cause greater suffering on a refined and delicate woman than a single act of violence on her person, and such acts may be well considered to be extreme cruelty. Bailey v. Bailey, 97 Mass. 373, 378.

In Barrere v. Barrere (N. Y.) 4 Johns. Ch. 187, 189, Chancellor Kent says "that 2 Wds. & P.—49 mere petulance and rudeness, and sallies of passion, might not be sufficient; but a series of acts of personal violence, or danger of life, limb, or health, are." The conduct of a defendant in raising an ax and threatening to cut down his wife, and continual use of insulting language toward her, are within the meaning of the term "extreme cruelty." Graecen v. Graecen, 2 N. J. Eq. (1 H. W. Green) 459, 466.

Under the statute providing for divorce, the conduct or treatment complained of must be so cruel and inhuman as to make it unsafe for the wife to continue under the husband's power and dominion, or such indignities must be offered to her person as to render her condition so intolerable, that she is forced to withdraw from his house. This strong language is not intended to apply to cases where a wife permits herself to become very unhappy and dissatisfied with her condition, by magnifying the faults and indiscretions of her husband. It could not have been intended, as it is inconsistent with the force of the words used by the Legislature that every fault or indiscretion, or even wrong, on the part of the husband, which, owing to the greater refinement or peculiar taste and habits of the wife, caused her to feel that her situation was intolerable, should be the ground of a divorce. It must not only appear to the court that she considered it unsafe and improper for her to continue under the control of her husband, but it must appear from the facts that the causes set forth in the statute really existed for such feelings and conclusions; that is, the wrong complained of must be cruel and inhuman, or the indignity to her person so great, as to force her to withdraw from him because her condition is not to be endured in consequence of such maltreatment. Shell v. Shell, 34 Tenn. (2 Sneed) 716, 722.

Where there was no violence ever committed or attempted, and the most that could be claimed was that the husband, in his intercourse with his wife, did not exhibit that regard for her which was due from him as her husband, and that the marriage was never productive of much happiness for either party, there was no ground for a divorce on account of cruelty. Morris v. Morris, 14 Cal. 76, 77, 73 Am. Dec. 615.

It is very difficult to give any affirmative definition which will express with entire accuracy the meaning of extreme cruelty in statutes concerning divorce. Courts have refrained from laying down any inflexible rule which should serve as a standard by which to adjudge all cases. The weight of authority is that the injury actually inflicted or reasonably apprehended must be bodily harm, in distinction from mere mental suffering. The injury may be either to the safety of the person or to the health of the aggrieved party, and it is not necessary that it be actually inflicted. It is sufficient if it be reasonably apprehended. Each case must be determined according to its circumstances. Slight abuse of the person, accompanied by opprobrious language, which would imperil the health of a refined and delicate wife, might be endured with comparative unconcern by one of a less sensitive nature. Without attempting to give a definition applicable to all cases, it may be said that where the husband has been guilty, or there is reasonable ground to apprehend that he will be guilty, of any actual violence which will endanger the safety or the health of the wife, or where he has inflicted any physical injury, accompanied by such persistent exhibition of ill feeling and opprobrious epithets as will endanger her health or render her life one of such extreme discomfort and wretchedness as to incapacitate her to discharge the duties of a wife, there is cruelty justifying divorce. Close v. Close, 25 N. J. Eq. (10 C. E. Green) 526, 527, 532.

"Cruel and inhuman treatment," as used in Rev. St. c. 79, § 9, subd. 5, providing that a wife may obtain a divorce for cruel and inhuman treatment by her husband, should be considered to have very much the sense of "sevitia" in the civil and ecclesiastical law; and hence, to justify a court in interfering to dissolve the marriage relation, grave and weighty causes must exist, which show that the duties of the married life cannot be discharged. Abusive and opprobrious language, which wounds the feelings merely, unaccompanied with any bodily injuries, actual or menaced, is not considered a ground for divorce. The use by the husband of cruel and tantalizing language toward his wife, treating her roughly, boasting of having secured his property from her, reminding her of the poverty of her parents, and asserting that their marriage was a shave, however unfeeling and unbecoming an honorable and affectionate husband, is not cruel and inhuman treatment; nor is compelling her to do her ironing on a low water pail bench, or taking the key of the house from her and locking her without the house. Johnson v. Johnson, 4 Wis. 135, 141.

Grossly improper language, foul terms, and vile epithets do not, however, of themselves constitute cruelty. Close v. Close, 24 N. J. Eq. (9 C. E. Green) 338, 339.

The commission of acts which outrage the feelings of modesty and decency, such as threatening to commit adultery or using insulting language, if persisted in, and unatoned for, constitute cruel treatment. Gholston v. Gholston, 31 Ga. 625, 628.

Act May 8, 1854, gave a husband a right to a divorce where the wife, by cruel and barbarous treatment, should render his life burdensome. Held, that mere personal abuse or indignities is not sufficient. Gordan v. Gordan, 48 Pa. (12 Wright) 226, 236.

Accusation of infidelity.

The public aspersion of a virtuous wife by her husband, charging her with unchastity, constitutes such cruelty as will entitle her to divorce. Jones v. Jones, 60 Tex. 451, 458, 461.

A false accusation, either by the husband or wife, that the other is guilty of adultery, is sufficient cause for divorce; and it makes no difference that the charge was made after the parties had separated. Neither husband nor wife can claim a right to continue the marriage relation while falsely charging the other with unchastity. Smith v. Smith, 8 Or. 100, 102.

For a husband to falsely accuse his wife, in her presence and to their neighbors, with unchastity, and by reason thereof with being afflicted with a loathsome venereal disease, which she had communicated to him, constitutes cruel treatment, which entitles her to a divorce. McMahan v. McMahan, 9 Or. 525, 526.

Cruelty consists of successive acts of ill treatment, if not of personal injury, so that something of a condonation of earlier ill treatment must in such cases necessarily take place. Where a husband charged his wife with being guilty of adultery, and treated her in such a manner as to create a reasonable apprehension of bodily hurt, he was guilty of cruelty, justifying a divorce. Owens v. Owens, 31 S. E. 72, 74, 96 Va. 191.

False and malicious accusations of adultery, habitually made by the husband against the wife, constitute cruel and inhuman treatment. It is not necessary that there should be personal violence to constitute cruel and inhuman treatment. Any species of unkind treatment, accompanied by threats and words of menace, from the inevitable consequence of continued indulgence in which violence may reasonably be apprehended and result to the wife, unless prevented, or any danger to life, limb, and health, is cruel and inhuman treatment. It is, however, of the greatest importance that the cause of apprehension should not only be weighty, but such as clearly shows that the duties and obligations of the married life cannot be discharged. Kennedy v. Kennedy, 47 N. Y. Super. Ct. (15 Jones & S.) 56, 59, 60 How. Prac. 151, 152; Bihin v. Bihin (N. Y.) 17 Abb. Prac. 19, 26.

"'Cruelty' is defined to mean to give pain, willing or pleased to give torment, vex or afflict, or cause grief or misery." A husband could hardly, by any other means, cause a sensitive wife more mental pain, torment, vexation, affliction, grief, and misery, than to falsely charge her with adultery. Graft v. Graft, 76 Ind. 136, 138.

Where it appears that on one occasion a husband threatened to knock down his wife, who had always faithfully performed her wifely duties, and struck at her twice, and that he was continually abusive, calling her, "dirty bitch," "a liar," "a whore," and accused her of adulterous intercourse with other men, naming them, a divorce was justified on the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment. Waltermire v. Waltermire, 17 N. E. 739, 110 N. Y. 183.

In an action for divorce on the ground of cruel treatment, it is not necessary that there be actual violence to constitute cruel treatment. It may be such use of abuse and brutal language and charges of infidelity as will justify the conclusion that it will end in personal violence. Abbott v. Abbott, 61 N. E. 350, 351, 192 Ill. 439.

Austerity of temper.

A statute making cruelty a ground for divorce requires such cruelty as endangers life, limb, or health; but actual or threatened physical violence is not necessary to produce this effect. It may be accomplished by any continued course of insults and humiliations. Health and even life may be destroyed thereby. In the great case of Evans v. Evans, 1 Hagg. Cons. 35, Lord Stowell laid down certain principles which have been universally approved. He said: "What is cruelty? In the present case it is hardly necessary for me to define it, because the facts here complained of are such as fall within the most restricted definition of cruelty. They affect not only the comfort, but they affect the health, and even the life, of the party. What merely wounds the mental feelings is in few cases to be admitted, when not accompanied with bodily injury, either actual or menaced. Mere austerity of temper, petulance of manner, rudeness of language, a want of civil attention and accommodation, even occasional sallies of passion, if they do not threaten bodily harm, do not amount to legal cruelty. They are high moral offenses in the marriage state, undoubtedly, not innocent, surely, in any state of life; but still they are not that cruelty against which the law can relieve. In the older cases of this sort, which I have had an opportunity of looking into, I have observed that the danger of life, limb, or health is usually inserted as the ground upon which the court has proceeded to a separation. This doctrine has been repeatedly applied by the court in the cases that have been cited. The court has never been driven off this ground. It has always been jealous of the inconvenience of departing from it, and I have heard no case cited in which the court has granted a divorce without proof given of a reasonable apprehension of bodily hurt. I say an apprehension, because assuredly the court is not to wait until the hurt is actually done. But the apprehension must be reasonable. It must not be an apprehension arising merely from an exquisite and diseased sensibility of the mind." Kelly v. Kelly, 1 Pac. 194, 195, 18 Nev. 49, 51 Am. Rep. 732; See, also, Fritts v. Fritts, 36 Ill. App. 31, 32, 34; Harman v. Harman, 16 Ill. Gleason*, 19 N. W. 784, 16 Neb. 15; Day v. Day, 50 N. W. 979, 980, 84 Iowa, 221; Wheeler v. Wheeler, 5 N. W. 689, 692, 53 Iowa, 511, 36 Am. Rep. 240 (citing Beebe v. Beebe, 10 Iowa, 133; Caruthers v. Caruthers, 13 Iowa, 266); Rhame v. Rhame (S. C.) 1 McCord, Eq. 197, 206, 16 Am. Dec. 597; Freeman v. Freeman, 31 Wis. 235, 249.

Mere want of sympathy, disagreeable manners, delusions of ill temper, habitual disregard of the wife's feelings, refusal to protect her from the insults of others, etc., do not constitute cruelty, furnishing ground for divorce; but personal violence, whether inflicted or only threatened, is sufficient. Breinig v. Meltzler, 23 Pa. (11 Harris) 156, 160.

To constitute extreme cruelty in a husband, his misconduct must be such as to show that the inward knot of marriage, which is peace and love, is untied, and that he exercises over his wife, not the mild and salutary authority of a husband, but a harsh and cruel tyranny. Poor v. Poor, 8 N. H. 307, 315, 29 Am. Dec. 664.

Communication of disease.

The communication of a venereal disease will constitute legal cruelty only when the disease is knowingly or willfully communicated. Anonymous (N. Y.) 17 Abb. N. C. 231, 235.

Desertion and nonsupport.

Cruel and inhuman treatment, as a cause of divorce, is not confined to mere physical treatment which is cruel and inhuman, but includes the act of a husband in absconding from the state and leaving his wife to support herself and child, without explanation or correspondence with her. Eastes v. Eastes, 79 Ind. 363, 370.

Cruel and inhuman treatment on the part of the husband, entitling the wife to a divorce, is shown by evidence that the wife was an amiable and industrious woman; that the husband was shiftless, furnishing no means of support for himself and wife, but living from place to place, as he was compelled to move for nonpayment of board; and that he treated her as unworthy of the position as his wife, and finally abandoned her. Wilson v. Wilson (Ky.) 38 S. W. 140.

"Cruelty," as used in a statute authorizing divorce for extreme cruelty in neglecting or refusing to provide suitable maintenance for the wife, means acts of cruelty such as to cause injury to the life, limb, or health of the plaintiff, or danger of such injury, or reasonable apprehension of such danger, if the parties continue to live together. Mere nonsupport, however, is not sufficient. Bailey v. Bailey, 97 Mass. 373, 378.

The denial of necessities and comforts by a husband to a wife, he having the means to furnish them, would certainly endanger her life and health, though done in the blandest way, and so would constitute cruel and barbarous treatment. Butler v. Butler (Pa.) 1 Pars. Eq. Cas. 329, 344.

Habits or conduct toward others.

"Cruel and inhuman treatment," as used in a statute authorizing a divorce, means excessive cruel treatment and outrage, which affects the wife directly or personally, and not immediately or remotely. Unless she is so affected in body or in spirit, there is no cruel and inhuman treatment. Though her husband may be the vilest of the vile, a corsair, or a brigand, so long as he treats the wife with gentleness, kindness, and affection, he is not guilty of cruel and inhuman treatment, authorizing a divorce. Schreck v. Schreck, 32 Tex. 578, 589, 5 Am. Rep. 251. Lewd and indecent conduct of a husband toward the daughter of his wife by a former husband does not come within this definition. Cline v. Cline, 10 Or. 474, 475.

The production of mental as well as physical suffering may constitute cruelty. The cruel beating of a young child, notwithstanding the prayers and remonstrances of the mother, is such an outrage on her maternal sympathies as will constitute cruelty to her. Bihin v. Bihin (N. Y.) 17 Abb. Prac. 19, 26.

Drunkenness by itself is insufficient to entitle a party to a divorce on the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment. Anonymous (N. Y.) 17 Abb. N. C. 231, 232.

Insults and neglect.

Cruel treatment, such as will warrant a divorce, means mental anguish, or wounded feelings, constantly aggravated by repeated insult and neglect, as much as actual bruises to the person. Glass v. Wynn, 76 Ga. 319, 322.

Failure of a wife to remain at home and care for her sick husband, or to consent to his hiring a nurse, where he was under the care of a physician and not dependent solely on her, is not cruel and abusive treatment, within Pub. St. c. 146, § 1, providing that a divorce may be granted for such cause. Bonney v. Bonney, 55 N. E. 461, 175 Mass. 7, 78 Am. St. Rep. 473.

The phrase "cruel and barbarous," as used in Act 1854, making it a ground of divorce for a wife by cruel and barbarous treatment to render the condition of her husband intolerable or his life burdensome, does not include conduct on the part of the wife, characterized by obstinate silence, laziness, or willful neglect of household duties. Appeal of Harris (Pa.) 2 Wkly. Notes Cas. 331, 332.

The statutes do not confine the cruelty necessary to justify a divorce to mere physical violence. But the grievance, of whatever kind, must be of the most aggravated nature to justify a divorce, and the mere fact that parties to a marriage are living in very unpleasant relations is not sufficient to justify divorce on the grounds of cruelty. Cooper v. Cooper, 17 Mich. 205, 210, 97 Am. Dec. 182.

Insanity as affecting.

A divorce, on default, for inhuman cruelty of a wife declared insane a month later, should be set aside, on a showing by her guardian that the cruelty was the result of insanity existing when the process was served against her. Cohn v. Cohn, 24 Pac. 659, 85 Cal. 108. See, also, Sapp v. Sapp, 9 S. W. 258, 259, 71 Tex. 348.

Where a husband was insane at the time of committing alleged acts of cruelty to his wife, and mentally incapable of knowing what he did, he could not be held responsible for his acts, and the acts thus committed are not a reasonable cause for divorce, as the cruelty contemplated by the statute as a ground for divorce is conscious and intentional cruelty. Powell v. Powell, 18 Kan. 371, 378, 26 Am. Rep. 774.

Mental distress.

It is impossible to lay down any precise rule by which to decide under a given set of facts whether legal cruelty does or does not exist. It has, however, generally been held that, when there is no physical violence, the cruel conduct, in order to warrant a divorce, must be such as will produce a degree of mental distress which threatens at least to impair the health of the injured party. Eastman v. Eastman, 12 S. W. 1107, 1108, 75 Tex. 473.

There may be legal cruelty without evidence of personal violence. It is true that not every fancied or real wrong, which may for awhile render unsafe the complainant's life, or subject her to momentary pain or temporary illness would amount to legal cruelty; but if the act involves—that is, if it is connected by natural circumstances or affects—the health, not for a moment, not temporarily, but to its actual and real prejudice, it amounts to legal cruelty. Cole v. Cole, 23 Iowa, 433, 438.

Cruelty as a matrimonial offense is defined to be such conduct in one of the married parties as to the reasonable apprehension of the other, or in fact, renders cohabitation physically unsafe to a degree justifying a withdrawal therefrom. Abuse, which causes mental suffering and produces ill health, rendering cohabitation physically unsafe, is legal cruelty, although no personal violence is inflicted or threatened. Jones v. Jones, 62 N. H. 463, 464, 465.

Acts and words may be construed as constituting cruel and inhuman treatment, though they cause no physical pain. Atherton v. Atherton, 31 N. Y. Supp. 977, 980, 82 Hun, 179.

To constitute such cruelty as will authorize a divorce, it is not necessary that physical injury should be inflicted or threatened, but mental suffering, when intentionally imposed, may be so grievous and lasting as to warrant a dissolution of the bonds of matrimony. Wright v. Wright, 6 Tex. 316; Sheffield v. Sheffield, 3 Tex. 79, 87; Taylor v. Taylor, 18 Tex. 574, 578; Bahn v. Bahn, 62 Tex. 518, 50 Am. Rep. 539; Jones v. Jones, 60 Tex. 451, 452; Sapp v. Sapp, 9 S. W. 258, 259, 71 Tex. 348.

The ordinary meaning of "cruelty" in actions for divorce is that the act endangers or threatens the life, limb, or health of the aggrieved party. To this is added any outrage on the feelings inflicting mental pain or anguish. McAllister v. McAllister, 10 S. W. 294, 295, 71 Tex. 695.

Refusal of sexual intercourse.

A wife's utter denial of sexual intercourse is not to be regarded, within a reasonable interpretation of the provisions of the statute relating to divorce, as cruel and abusive treatment. The cruelty charged must appear to be such "as shall cause injury to life, limb, or health, or create a danger of such injury, or a reasonable apprehension of such danger." Cowles v. Cowles, 112 Mass. 298.

The refusal of a husband to have sexual intercourse with his wife does not constitute cruel and inhuman treatment, and is not a sufficient ground for divorce a vinculo. Schoessow v. Schoessow, 53 N. W. 856, 857, 83 Wis. 553.

Series of acts.

Cruelty is cumulative, admitting of degrees and augmenting by addition, so that it may be condoned, and even forgiven, for a time and up to a certain point, without any bar in sense or reason to bringing it forward when the continuance of it has rendered it no longer condonable. Cruelty extending through a series of years must consist of numerous acts, many of which might, and possibly would, be of themselves of the character not to warrant a divorce, yet, constantly recurring, they would indicate a wicked mind, and, taken all together, would show that the condition of the suffering was unsafe and beyond the point of further forbearance. McClanahan v. McClanahan, 56 S. W. 858, 861, 104 Tenn. 217.

Cruel and inhuman treatment, such as authorizes a divorce, means any willful misconduct of the husband which endangers the life or health of the wife, or which exposes her to bodily hazard and intolerable hardship and renders cohabitation unsafe, or is extremely cruel, and in order to amount to such cruelty it is not necessary that there should be many acts. Beyer v. Beyer, 6 N. W. 807, 808, 50 Wis. 254, 36 Am. Rep. 848 (citing Poor v. Poor, 8 N. H. 307, 316, 29 Am. Dec. 664).

Cruelty as a ground for divorce consists in successive acts of ill treatment, if they threaten bodily harm. Westmeath v. Westmeath, 4 Eccl. R. 238, 264.

Single act or acts of long standing.

"A single act of cruelty may be so severe and attended with acts of such atrocity as to justify a divorce. No single act of indignity to the person is sufficient for a divorce. There must be such a course of conduct or continued treatment as renders the wife's condition unendurable and life burdensome. The indignities to the person need not be such as to endanger life or health, but such as would render life too humiliating to bear." May v. May, 62 Pa. (12 P. F. Smith) 206, 210.

In an action for divorce on the ground of cruelty of treatment, the only particular in which the testimony of the wife was corroborated was the alleged fact that her husband on one occasion kicked her. In considering this the court said: "This single act of violence on his part, though it cannot be justified in morals or in law, will not constitute cruelty of treatment within the meaning of the law as a cause for divorce." Goodhues v. Goodhues, 44 Atl. 990, 90 Md. 292.

It is not every single touching of the wife's person in anger, at a moment of sudden excitement or of passion, that will authorize the granting of a divorce. A man may lay hands on his wife, even rudely, if necessary to prevent the commission of some unlawful or criminal purpose. Richards v. Richards (Pa.) 1 Grant, Cas. 389, 391.

Cruelty is either actual violence or reasonable apprehension of such violence. "Isolated cases of wrong or cruelty of long standing on the part of the husband will not entitle the wife to a divorce, especially where a different course of treatment has since been pursued; but evidence of such acts is competent and proper, in connection with more recent acts, to show a series of wrongs and injuries on the part of the husband. Graecen v. Graecen, 2 N. J. Eq. (1 H. W. Green) 459.

Cruel and abusive treatment is not established by a single blow, though given in anger. Hardie v. Hardie, 29 Atl. 886, 887, 162 Pa. 227, 25 L. R. A. 697.

Cruel treatment, as a cause for divorce, means an extreme or continued cruelty of treatment, or any danger to life, limb, or health, such as renders impossible the proper discharge of the duties of married life; and a single act of personal violence is not sufficient. Hosball v. Hosball, 51 Md. 72, 75, 34 Am. Rep. 298.

A single act of a sufficiently aggravated character may suffice to constitute cruelty; and, where acts are not so highly aggravated, a number of them may be considered together as showing a course of conduct. Where an act constituting cruelty is proved, minor acts of the same kind may be shown by way of aggravation. Uhlmann v. Uhlmann (N. Y.) 17 Abb. N. C. 236.

Finley v. Finley, 39 Ky. (9 Dana) 52, 33 Am. Dec. 528, was a suit for alimony upon the charge of cruel, inhuman, and barbarous treatment. It was shown that the previous intercourse of the parties had not been of a very agreeable character, that a single act of personal violence had been committed by the husband, and that a separation immediately ensued. Judge Ewing, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "Upon the whole, we can regard the affair in no other light than as a sudden freak of passion on both sides, in which no serious injury was done, and which should have been passed by and forgotten with the moment, and furnished no sufficient ground to justify a dissolution of the sacred connection of man and wife." Morris v. Morris, 14 Cal. 76, 80, 73 Am. Dec. 615.

Threats.

Cruelty, such as to entitle a husband to divorce, is such conduct as renders his condition unendurable and his life burdensome. Threats alone may constitute cruelty, since, when they are both serious and diabolical in their nature, and produce alarm and dread, they are in themselves acts. "They are not like mere words of reproach or anger or false imputation, but imbue the mind with fear, and tend directly to endanger health, and may even imperil life." Jones v. Jones, 66 Pa. (16 P. F. Smith) 494, 496, 497.

Cruelty, such as to authorize a divorce, does not include words of abuse or reproach; but words of menace, intimating a malignant intention of doing bodily harm and affecting the security of life, constitute such cruelty, as also such acts as spitting on a wife and compelling her by threats to go to certain places. D'Aguilar v. D'Aguilar, 1 Hagg. Eccl. 773.

Mere declarations of the husband, unaccompanied by acts, do not constitute cruel and barbarous treatment, entitling the wife to a divorce. Eshbach v. Eshbach, 23 Pa. (11 Harris) 343, 345; Richards v. Richards (Pa.) 1 Grant, Cas. 389, 391.

To authorize an interposition of the courts to grant a separation from bed and board on the ground of cruelty, there must be ill treatment and personal injury, or a reasonable apprehension of personal injury. Words of menace, accompanied by a probability of bodily violence, will be sufficient. It may be enough if the words are such as inflict indignity and threaten pain. Spitting on the wife, or a groundless charge against her chastity, constitute gross cruelty; and so, where the evidence shows that force was resorted to and personal violence inflicted, and also a violence done to the feelings of the wife still more cruel and inhuman, a separation from bed and board was justified. Whispell v. Whispell (N. Y.) 4 Barb. 217, 219.

A threat, not giving rise to any apprehension of immediate personal injury, does not constitute legal cruelty. Anonymous (N. Y.) 17 Abb. N. C. 231, 235.

Cruelty, in order to be ground for divorce, must be such as to raise a reasonable apprehension in regard to the wife's personal safety. She must have ground to believe that she was exposed to physical injury by a continuance of cohabitation. There must be in all cases ill treatment and personal injury, or a reasonable apprehension of injury. Words of menace, accompanied by probability of bodily violence, will be sufficient. Davies v. Davies (N. Y.) 55 Barb. 130, 134.

Vexatious conduct.

Cruelty "is any act intended to torment, vex, or afflict, or which actually afflicts or torments, without necessity, or any act of wrong, inhumanity, oppression, or injustice. The word 'cruel' has no technical signification, as contradistinguished from its broad, popular sense; and many acts are held by the courts to be 'cruel,' and not regarded as sufficient to authorize a divorce, because not amounting to personal violence or creating a reasonable apprehension thereof. Not every act of disagreement of husband and wife, or mere austerity of temper, or want of civil attention or accommodations, rudeness of language, and even occasional sallies of passion, will be sufficient to constitute 'cruelty.' Still marriage is a civil contract, in which each is the equal of the other. The wife is not the menial or slave of the husband, and if, by intentional unkindness, reproach, and indignities he embitters her life and makes it impossible that the marriage state can be continued by the parties in happiness or satisfaction, a divorce should be granted." Myrick v. Myrick, 67 Ga. 771, 775.

The husband, by a course of humiliating insults and annoyances, practiced in various forms which ingenious malice could devise, could eventually destroy the life or health of his wife, although such conduct was unaccompanied by violence, positive or threatened; and where this is proven the wife is entitled to a divorce. Butler v. Butler (Pa.) 1 Pars. Eq. Cas. 329, 344.

"To render the condition of the wife intolerable and her life burdensome, it is not necessary that there should be blows, or cruel and barbarous infliction of batteries, that endanger her life. There may be, without that, such indignities to her as to render her life a burden. * * * All treatment which proceeds from hatred, revenge, and spite, and which renders even the hours devoted to repose hours of weeping and distress, must render a woman's condition intolerable." Elmes v. Elmes, 9 Pa. (9 Barr) 166, 167.

Cruel and inhuman conduct, sufficient to authorize the granting of a divorce, is only such conduct in which the husband "evinces a malignant desire to vex, annoy, and harass the wife." Boon v. Boon, 8 Pac. 450, 451, 12 Or. 437.

CRUELTY TO ANIMALS.

The word "cruelty" shall be held to include every willful act, omission, or negligence, whereby unjustifiable physical pain, suffering, or death is caused or permitted. Pen. Code Ga. 1895, § 705; Ann. St. Ind. T. 1899, § 1298; Pen. Code N. Y. 1903, § 669; Code N. C. 1883, § 2490; Rev. St. Me. 1883, p. 911, c. 124, § 48; Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 6542; People v. Brunell (N. Y.) 48 How. Prac. 435, 447; McKinne v. State, 9 S. E. 1091, 81 Ga. 164; Griffith v. State, 43 S. E. 251, 252, 116 Ga. 835.

The word "cruelty" shall be held to include every act, omission, or neglect whereby unnecessary or unjustifiable pain or suffering is caused, permitted, or allowed to continue, when there is a reasonable remedy or relief. Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 3721; Rev. St. Wyo. 1899, § 2287; Mills' Ann. St. Colo. 1891, § 117; Waters v. People, 46 Pac. 112, 113, 23 Colo. 33, 33 L. R. A. 836, 58 Am. St. Rep. 215.

"Cruelly," as used in an indictment charging defendant with cruelly beating a certain horse, against the peace of the commonwealth, means a beating with a willful and cool temper of mind, as well as the pain inflicted by the act. Commonwealth v. McClellan, 101 Mass. 34, 35.

An indictment, alleging in the words of the statute that the defendant, having the custody and charge of a dog, did "knowingly and willfully authorize and permit said dog to be subjected to unnecessary torture, suffering, and cruelty, and that he did this by knowingly and willfully suffering and permitting said dog to be bitten, mangled, and cruelly tortured by a certain other dog," alleges with certainty and without ambiguity facts constituting an offense within the spirit and letter of the statute. Commonwealth v. Thornton, 113 Mass. 457, 458.

"Cruel treatment," as used in the statute prohibiting the cruel treatment of animals, includes "severe pain inflicted upon an animal for the mere purpose of causing pain or indulging vindictive passions; and so it is if inflicted without justifiable cause, and with reasonable cause to know that it is produced by the wanton or reckless conduct of the person who occasioned it." Commonwealth v. Lufkin, 89 Mass. (7 Allen) 579, 581.

Where one confined colts, and from motives of willful and malicious mischief fixed a scythe at the place of their escape, and then, with intent to wound, maim, and destroy them, forced them over such scythe, whereby they were wounded, he was guilty of a misdemeanor at the common law. When the most wanton cruelty to the beast is the gravamen of the charge, we may pass by the civil injury, and treat the deed as a misdemeanor at common law. With force and arms to injure the property of another is a civil injury, for which the owner of the property may have his remedy by action of trespass; but wounding and torturing a living animal, not only with force and arms, but with wicked and malicious motives and intentions, is a misdemeanor to be punished by the judges. State v. Briggs (Vt.) 1 Aikens, 226, 230.

Under Laws 1866, c. 682, providing that every person who shall, by his act or neglect, maliciously kill or maim or wound or injure or torture or cruelly beat any animal, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, dislocating the limbs of animals to be slaughtered while yet alive, and plunging them while yet alive in boiling water, are criminal offenses. Davis v. Society for Prevention of Cruelty (N. Y.) 16 Abb. Prac. N. S. 73, 78.

Administration of drug.

In Pen. Code, tit. 16, the caption of which is "Cruelty to Animals," the words "torture" or "cruelty" are defined to include any act, omission, or neglect whereby unjustifiable physical pain, suffering, or death is caused or permitted; and under the same title section 660 provides that a person who unjustifiably administers any poisonous or noxlous drug or substance to any animal, or unjustifiably exposes such drug or substance with the intent that the same shall be taken by an animal, whether such animal be the property of himself or another, is guilty of a misdemeanor, such acts also constitute cruelty to animals. People v. Davy (N. Y.) 32 N. Y. Supp. 106.

Beating.

Cruelty to animals, as distinguished from that chastisement which is really administered for purposes of training and discipline, is "the beating and needless infliction of pain, which is dictated by a cruel disposition, violent passions, a spirit of revenge, or reckless indifference to suffering. If resorted to in good faith and for a proper purpose, it will not necessarily be malicious, because it may be deemed to be excessive; but the undue severity should be carefully weighed by the jury in determining whether or not it was in fact dictated by a malignant spirit, and not by any justifiable motive." State v. Avery, 44 N. H. 392, 396.

The evidence for defendant, indicted for cruelly beating a horse, showed that he was riding the horse, when at his instance a hog was placed on the horse's back; that the horse jumped, and threw both rider and hog; that defendant then struck the horse several blows over the hip with a small plank, and, after this broke, tied the horse to a fence and struck it several times with a stick about four feet long and as thick as defendant's wrist; that the horse jumped through the barb-wire fence; and that the defendant followed and continued to strike him. Held, that such chastisement constituted cruelty. Tinsley v. State (Tex.) 22 S. W. 39, 40.

Deliberation.

The offense of cruelty to animals at common law included deliberation, as evidencing a wicked intent to inflict injury upon animals. This was held in the case of People v. Ross, 3 City H. Rec. 191, where a cartman, intending to beat his horse for refusing to draw its load, struck it a single blow upon the neck, which killed it. He was acquitted on the ground that the evidence showed no deliberate intention to kill the animal, but to chastise it. The courts of the state as far back as 1882 have held that wanton cruelty to an animal, e. g., excessive beating by a cartman or any deliberate cruelty to an animal, is a misdemeanor at common law. Broadway Stage Co. v. Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, 15 Abb. Prac. N. S. 51, 63.

Killing for sport.

The term "cruelty to animals" includes the shooting of tame pigeons for sport. Paine v. Bergh (N. Y.) 1 City Ct. R. 160.

By Code, § 2487, providing that any person who shall do any act toward the furtherance of an act of cruelty to any animal shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, the words "torture," "torment," and "cruelty" are defined to include every act, omission, and neglect whereby unjustifiable physical pain, suffering, or death is caused or permitted. So that one who inflicts suffering and death on any useful beast, fowl, or animal for amusement and sport is within such provision. State v. Porter, 16 S. E. 915, 916, 112 N. C. 887.

Needless killing.

The needless killing of chickens is cruelty, within Code, § 2482, though done without torture. State v. Neal, 27 S. E. 81, 82, 120 N. C. 613, 58 Am. St. Rep. 810.

Under Rev. St. § 2101, imposing a penalty on one who cruelly beats or mutilates any animal, the killing of an animal, in order to constitute an offense, must be needless, and the simple charge of killing an animal constitutes no offense. Hunt v. State. 29 N. E. 933, 3 Ind. App. 383.

Overworking, underfeeding, etc.

"Cruelty," as the term is used in the phrase "cruelty to animals," with reference to work animals, consists in overworking, underfeeding, or depriving of proper protection, all of which elements may combine and constitute the offense. State v. Bosworth, 4 Atl. 248, 54 Conn. 1.

Code, § 705, declares that the cruelty referred to in section 703, providing that "every person who shall instigate, engage in, or do anything in furtherance of an act of cruelty to a domestic animal, shall be punished as for a misdemeanor," includes "every willful act, omission, or neglect, whereby unjustifiable physical pain, suffering, or death is caused or permitted." The omission or neglect to furnish an animal sufficient food for its sustenance, by its owner or keeper, is a willful violation of this statute. Griffith v. State, 43 S. E. 251, 252, 116 Ga. 835.

Statutes against cruelty to animals have rarely received judicial construction by courts of last resort. In Commonwealth v. Wood, 111 Mass. 408, 410, the jury were instructed that if the defendant, in proper exercise of his own judgment, thought he was not overdriving the horse, he must be acquitted, and that he could not be convicted unless he knowingly and intentionally overdrove it. The Supreme Court, in commenting on this instruction, says: "A proper exercise of his own judgment means the honest exercise of his judgment, as distinguished from mere recklessness of consequences, or willful cruelty." In State v. Hackfath, 20 Mo. App. 614, we decided that the intent with which cruelty is inflicted on the animal is immaterial, provided that the act itself was willful, and not accidental. Evidence that a horse was overdriven does not warrant a conviction under Rev. St. 1879, § 1609, prohibiting cruelty to animals, in the absence of proof that the overdriving was willful, and not accidental. State v. Roche, 37 Mo. App. 480, 481, 482.

CRUISE.

Shipping articles between the owners and the commander, officers, and crew of a privateer stipulated that the steamer should cruise where the owners directed, and three-fifths of the net proceeds of all the prizes and prize goods taken during the cruise should belong to the owners, and no one of the company should, before the end of the cruise, sell more than one-half his share; the captain, officers, and crew agreeing to remain on board for three months from the time of sailing, unless the cruise was sooner completed in the opinion of the owners. Held, that "cruise" meant a voyage for the purpose of making captures jure belli. Cruise ex vi termini does not include a given portion of time, without reference to the place of commencement or termination, but includes a connected portion or immediate succession of time, in whatever manner the same may be calculated. The boundaries of a cruise, like those of a voyage, may be defined by local limits or by artificial time, or by both combined. A "cruise" imports a definite place of commencement and termination, unless that construction be repelled by the context. If no provision is made to the contrary, it must be presumed that a cruise comprehends a return to the country, if not to the home port, of the privateer. A cruise may still have a continuance, notwithstanding an arrival in port, and is not necessarily extinguished thereby, unless such inference result from the express stipulations or the overt acts of the parties. The Brutus (U. S.) 4 Fed. Cas. 490, 494.

CRUISING GROUND.

The term "cruising ground" is not synonymous with "pilot's water" or "pilotage ground." By "pilot's cruising ground" is meant that distance out in the sea from a certain extent of coast that pilots cruise for vessels bound to ports into which a pilot may take them by his commission, while "pilot's water" or "pilotage ground" means the access to a bay, inlet, or river or port, beginning at the exterior point where a pilot may take leave of an outward-bound vessel, and extending to the place fixed by a law or usage for the anchorage of inward-bound vessels. The Whistler (U. S.) 13 Fed. 295, 298.

CRY.

Webster defines the word "cry" as follows: "To make oral and public proclamation of; to notify or advertise by outcry, especially things lost or found, goods to be sold, etc.; public advertisement by outcry; proclamation, as by hawkers." As used in a statute authorizing the council of a city to regulate the ringing of bells and the crying of goods and other commodities for sale at auction or otherwise, by "crying of goods" is meant the advertising of any sale of goods by oral and public proclamation, by outcry, and the statute confers no authority on the council in any manner to regulate such a sale. City of Rochester v. Close (N. Y.) 85 Hun, 208, 210.

CUBIC YARD.

A contract for mason work at a certain price per cubic yard is not ambiguous, as "cubic yard" is a term well known to every one. It means 27 cubic feet, and it will be presumed that the term was used in its ordinary and popular meaning. Corcoran v. Chess, 18 Atl. 876, 877, 131 Pa. 356.

CUCKING STOOL

The term "cucking stool" was anciently used as synonymous with the more familiar term "ducking stool." It was an arrangement by which an offender was placed therein and temporarily submerged in water. James v. Commonwealth (Pa.) 12 Serg. & R. 220, 227.

CUL-DE-SAC.

See, also, "Highway"; "Street"; "Thoroughfare."

The term "cul-de-sac" is used to designate a way in a city which is of the nature of a street, but which has but one entrance, and does not communicate with any street or passageway at any place except the one entrance. Perrin v. New York Cent. R. Co. (N. Y.) 40 Barb. 65, 70.

The term "cul-de-sac" may be properly used to designate an alley having an entrance at one end, but no outlet at the other. Talbot v. Richmond & D. R. Co. (Va.) 81 Grt. 685, 691; Adams v. Harrington, 14 N. E. 603, 606, 114 Ind. 66.

A "cul-de-sac" is a street which is closed at one end, and only communicates with a public road or street at the other. Whether a cul-de-sac can or cannot be a public highway, depends on the common law, and not upon statute. Hickok v. Trustees of Village of Plattsburg (N. Y.) 41 Barb. 130, 135.

A "cul-de-sac" is a way open at one end only. Such a way may be a public street or highway. "True, in Holdane v. Trustees of Village of Cold Springs (N. Y.) 23 Barb. 123, two of the three judges held that a street could not be a highway. They based their decision upon what they supposed to be the common law. It has been laid down by Lord Kenyon in Rugby Charity v. Merryweather, 11 East, 376, that a mere cul-de-sac might be a highway; that otherwise such places would be traps to catch trespassers. And in Bateman v. Black, 14 Eng. Law & Eq. 69, the question was fully considered, and the court held that it was no objection to a highway that it was a mere cul-de-sac, and not a thoroughfare. And in People v. Kingman, 24 N. Y. 559, the Court of Appeals very pointedly condemn the decision in Holdane v. Trustees of Village of Cold Springs (N. Y.) 23 Barb. 123, and held that upon principle as well as authority it is no objection to the highway or public street that it is a cul-de-sac; that public ways with an outlet at one end may and often do exist." Bartlett v. City of Bangor, 67 Me. 460, 467.

CULL.

See "Dead Culls."

A "cull," in the lumber business, is a board full of holes or knots, and not considered merchantable. Sloan v. Allegheny Co., 46 Atl. 1003, 1004, 91 Md. 501.

The word "cull," as used in a tie contract, meant ties that did not conform to the specifications. Chapman v. Kansas City, C. & S. Ry. Co., 48 S. W. 646, 652, 146 Mo. 481.

CULM.

In a lease of all the coal on certain lands, reserving a royalty on coal mined that would pass over a $\frac{3}{8}$ -inch mesh, and providing that the lessor should have all the culm, the term "culm" meant the coal which passes through the screens or breakers, and is then placed in what is known as the "culm" or "refuse" heap. It is unmarketable coal, and may, according to the demands of the market, include at one time what is marketable at another time. The word "culm" was doubtless brought to the Pennsylvania coal fields by Welsh miners. With them the word has been used to describe an inferior grade of coal of but little value, and it readily came into use to define coal not inferior in quality, but unmarketable and valueless because of its size. It was the adaptation of a word to a use closely akin to its original meaning. The words "culm or refuse" coal, as used in the lease, meant refuse coal; that is to say, coal refused by the lessee because it was unsalable, and which, of necessity, to make room for the operation of the work, was removed and thrown into a pile. Lance v. Lehigh & W. B. Coal Co., 29 Atl. 755, 163 Pa. 84.

CULPABLE.

"Culpable," as used in speaking of "culpable negligence," means blamable. Peoria & P. U. Ry. Co. v. Clayberg, 107 Ill. 644, 651.

An act, to be "culpable"—that is, to be a breach of legal duty—must be such as a reasonably careful man would fear would be productive of injury. It is to be distinguished from the word "proximately," for a breach of duty to be proximately producing an injury must be such that, whether the defendant could foresee the injury to be probable or not, the breach of duty is in fact the probable cause of the injury. Carter v. Cape Fear Lumber Co., 39 S. E. 828, 830, 129 N. C. 203.

CULPABLE NEGLECT.

Culpable neglect "means not only criminal, but censurable, and, when the term is applied to the omission by a person to preserve the means of enforcing his own rights, 'censurable' is more nearly an equivalent." Waltham Bank v. Wright, 90 Mass. (8 Allen) 121, 122.

"Culpable neglect," as used in Rev. St. c. 87, § 19, authorizing a creditor who has not filed his claim against the estate of a decedent within the time limited by the preceding sections to proceed by bill in equity to obtain relief when the Supreme Judicial Court is of opinion that justice and equity require it, and that such creditor is not chargeable with culpable neglect in not prosecuting his claim within the time so limited, is not criminal neglect, but any neglect that was censurable or blameworthy; the neglect which exists when the loss can fairly be ascribed to the plaintiff's own carelessness, improvidence, or folly. Bennett v. Bennett, 44 Atl. 894, 895, 93 Me. 241.

CULPABLE NEGLIGENCE.

"Culpable negligence" is the omission to do something which a reasonable, prudent, and honest man would do, or the doing of something which such a man would not do, under the circumstances surrounding the particular case. Hot Springs R. Co. v. Newman, 36 Ark. 607, 611; Sikes v. Sheldon, 13 N. W. 53, 54, 58 Iowa, 744; St. Louis, I. M. & S. Ry. Co. v. Bragg (Ark.) 50 S. W. 273, 274. Or it is the want of such care as men of ordinary prudence would use under similar circumstances. Woodman v. Town of Nottingham, 49 N. H. 387, 392, 6 Am. Rep. 526; People v. Buddensieck, 4 N. Y. Cr. R. 230, 265; Montgomery v. Scott, 10 S. C. (10 Rich.) 449, 451; State v. Emery, 78 Mo. 77, 80, 47 Am. Rep. 92.

A man is guilty of culpable negligence when he does or omits to do an act that an ordinarily prudent man in the same situation and with equal experience would have done or omitted to do, or when he voluntarily exposes himself to a danger which there was no occasion for him to incur in the proper discharge of his duties. Kimball v. Palmer (U. S.) 80 Fed. 240, 241, 25 C. C. A. 394 (citing Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Carpenter [U. S.] 56 Fed. 454, 5 C. C. A. 554).

Culpable negligence is "that failure to exercise that degree of care, whether slight, ordinary, or great, which is required in a particular instance, though the party may have exercised some care, and it may be only slightly less than the degree of care required." Chicago, K. & N. Ry. Co. v. Brown, 24 Pac. 497, 499, 44 Kan. 384; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Plaskett, 26 Pac. 401, 403, 47 Kan. 107.

All negligence, to be culpable, necessarily implies the failure to perform some duty. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Plaskett, 26 Pac. 401, 403, 47 Kan. 107.

Injury must be foreseen.

The word "culpable" is not equivalent to "proximate." An act to be culpable—that is, to be a breach of legal duty—must be such as a reasonably careful man would foresee would be productive of injury. A person is not liable for an injury which he could not foresee. Carter v. Cape Fear Lumber Co., 39 S. E. 828, 831, 129 N. C. 203.

Intent implied.

An indictment charged that defendant, in the manner and by the means described, willfully and with "culpable negligence" did kill and murder, against the peace and dignity of the state. If the killing was by culpable negligence, then it was not intentional; or, if the killing was willful, then it could not have been accidental. The two terms are inconsistent, and they cannot be true; hence the indictment is insufficient. State v. Lockwood, 24 S. W. 1015, 1016, 119 Mo. 463.

CULTIVATE—CULTIVATION.

See "Suitable for Cultivation."

To "cultivate and have the use of" lands amounts to a receipt of the rents and profits thereof, and therefore a person cultivating and having the use of land may be charged in a proper case with the receipt of the rents and profits. Thompson v. Bostick (S. C.) McMul. Eq. 75, 76.

A "state of cultivation," as applied to land, means its condition after it has been redeemed from its original, natural wild state; after it has been cleared and worked, and has been kept cultivated, and not permitted to revert to its original state. It is not necessary that the land should be actually yielding an income, but it is sufficient if it is in such a state as to be capable of being at once used for crops. Johnson v. Perley, 2 N. H. 56, 57, 9 Am. Dec. 55.

Act Cong. June 14, 1878 (20 Stat. 113), declaring a party entering public land should keep only one-fourth of the number of acres in timber, and requiring him to break or plow five acres the first year, five acres the second year, and to "cultivate to crop or otherwise" the five acres broken the first year, meant to sow or plant in wheat, corn, potatoes, or other annual crop which may be cultivated and harvested or gathered during the year, and not to plant timber seeds or cuttings; or "cultivate" limiting the word "otherwise," so as to apply to some act or process which involves the improvement or amelioration of the soil. United States v. Shinn (U. S.) 14 Fed. 447, 452.

"Cultivation," as used in the law relating to the cultivation of homesteads, means plowing and preparing it for crops, or the raising of something that grows from the ground besides grass. Making a stock farm or stock range of land is not putting it in cultivation. Fitting it for grazing, cutting the trees for the purpose of putting it in condition for grazing purposes, is not putting it in cultivation. United States v. Niemeyer (U. S.) 94 Fed. 147, 150.

By the "cultivation" of land is ordinarily understood something more than the gathering of crops which grow spontaneously or with little care. Land which can be "cultivated" within the meaning of the swamp land act (Act Cong. Sept. 28, 1850) is arable land, that which is adapted to the raising of crops which require annual planting and tillage, as corn, wheat, oats, rye, and barley, and which is susceptible of such cultivation in all ordinary seasons. American Emigrant Co. v. Rogers Locomotive Mach. Works, 83 Iowa, 612, 50 N. W. 52.

CULTIVATED FIELDS OR GROUNDS.

"A 'cultivated field,' as used in a statute providing for the punishment of any one removing a fence from around a cultivated field, means a piece or tract of land which has been cleared, fenced, and cultivated, or proposed to be cultivated, or kept and used for cultivation, according to the ordinary course of husbandry, although nothing may be growing within the inclosure at the time of the taking away of the fence." State v. McMinn, 81 N. C. 585, 588.

"Cultivated grounds," as used in Acts 1846, 1847, c. 70, providing for the punishment of any persons unlawfully burning, destroying, or removing any fence, wall, or other inclosure, or any part thereof, surrounding or about any yard, garden, or any other "cultivated grounds," cannot be construed as meaning only such grounds as had crops growing on them. "The word 'cultivated' may refer either to past or present time. A field on which a crop of wheat is growing is a 'cultivated field,' although not a stroke of labor may have been done in it since the seed was put into the ground; and it is a 'culhivated field' after the crop is removed. It is strictly a cultivated piece of ground." Mr. Bailey, in his Dictionary, defines "cultivate" to be "to till or husband the ground; to forward the product of the earth by general industry." The grounds, to come within the meaning, must be inclosed preparatory to being cultivated, or for some purpose connected with its husbandry. State v. Allen, 35 N. C. 36, 37.

CULTIVATED LANDS.

Using premises as part of a wood lot, taking therefrom wood for fuel and using it as a sugar bush, does not make it "cultivated or improved land," within Code Civ. Proc. §§ 371, 372, so as to sustain a claim of adverse possession. Thus, in Clark v. Phelps (N. Y.) 4 Cow. 190, 203, the court, in speaking of the terms "improved or cultivated land," as used in the law as to laying out of highways, says: These terms are to be taken in the popular sense, according to the general understanding of the community, when distinguishing what is called wild land, or land in a state of nature, from that which has been cultivated and improved. To improve and cultivate may be considered synonymous. To "cultivate" is defined as to improve the product of the earth by manual industry. When speaking of improved land it is generally understood to be such as has been reclaimed, is used for the purpose of husbandry, and is cultivated as such, whether the appropriation is for tillage, meadow, or pasture. So, in Doolittle v. Tice (N. Y.) 41 Barb. 181, 185, the court says: "Reaping alone can scarcely be considered as cultivating." Nor can the keeping up a fence already made, mowing the grass, and cutting brush be considered an improvement. Voight v. Meyer, 59 N. Y. Supp. 70, 72, 42 App. Div. 350.

CULVERT.

In a deed conveying two parcels of land to a railway, with the understanding that in constructing a culvert in its road on the new location it should be placed so as to drain as far as practicable the bed of a certain river, the word "culvert" was employed in its ordinary and common meaning, as a waterway or water passage, whether of wood or stone, square or arched, and did not necessarily mean an arched waterway of masonry, as is usually understood to be its architectural meaning. Oursler v. Baltimore & O. Ry. Co., 60 Md. 358, 367.

A "culvert" is defined by Worcester as an arched passage or drain for water beneath a road, canal, or railway. A culvert is not a bridge, within the meaning of the statute requiring county commissioners to construct and repair bridges over streams and water courses. Carroll County Com'rs v. Bailey, 23 N. E. 672, 673, 122 Ind. 46.

As bridge.

See "Bridge."

As covered drain or ditch.

"Culvert," as used in Laws N. H. 1893, c. 59, § 1, making towns liable for damages to a person traveling upon a culvert by reason of any obstruction, defect, insufficiency, or want of repair of such culvert, means a covered drain under a road, designed for the passage of water. Gale v. Town of Dover, 44 Atl. 535, 68 N. H. 403; Boyd v. Town of Derry, 68 N. H. 272, 38 Atl. 1005.

The term "culvert," as used in Laws 1879, providing for the recovery of damages sustained from a defective street, bridge, crosswalk, and "culvert," cannot be construed to include a ditch used to carry off the surplus water running along the side of a street, though it was covered for the purposes of a sidewalk. A "culvert," as known and designated, is an arched and covered drain running across and under the road, to carry the water across from one side to the other side of the road. Kowalka v. Common Council of Village of St. Joseph, 41 N. W. 416, 417, 73 Mich. 322.

CUM ONERE.

In defining the term "cum onere" Bouvier says that a purchaser with knowledge of an incumbrance takes the property cum onere. Holmes v. Danforth, 21 Atl. 845, 83 Me. 139.

CUM TESTAMENTO ANNEXO.

See "Administrator Cum Testamenta Annexo."

CUMBER.

The term "cumber," as used in Laws 1857, p. 285, to prevent the "cumbering" of streets, sidewalks, crosswalks, etc., was not synonymous with "encroaching." The Michigan laws have always made a distinction between "cumbering" and obstructing a public way and "encroaching" on it. The former term has been applied to impediments to travel and passage placed in the open street intending to make its use difficult or dangerous, while the latter has embraced actual inclosure of a portion of a street by fences or walks or occupation by buildings. An encroachment on a street may in one sense be said to cumber it, but, as the Legislature has never employed the two words as synonymous terms, a power to impose a penalty for cumbering or obstructing a street will not authorize a proceeding in the same manner as for encroachments. City of Grand Rapids v. Hughes, 15 Mich. 54, 57.

CUMULATIVE.

The definition of the word "cumulative" is "that which augments by addition; that is added to something else; in law, that augments, as evidence, facts, or arguments of the same kind." Webster. "It is derived from the Latin 'cumulo,' to heap up, or 'cumulus,' a heap." People v. Superior Court of City of New York (N. Y.) 10 Wend. 285, 294.

When one thing is cumulative on another, whether it be remedy, penalty, or power, we are speaking commonly of two things which are at least consistent, and might without incongruity be applied at the same time, as indictment and summary proceedings, fine and imprisonment, action for breach of covenant and ejectment for forfeiture. Two ways of doing the same thing, where only one of two can in fact be used, may make a case of election, but they are hardly cumulative. Reg. v. Eastern Archipelago Co., 18 Eng. Law & Eq. 167, 183.

CUMULATIVE EVIDENCE.

Cumulative evidence is additional evidence to support the same point, and which is of the same character with evidence already produced. People v. Superior Court of City of New York (N. Y.) 10 Wend. 285, 294; Brisbane v. Adams, 3 N. Y. Super. Ct. (1 Sandf.) 195, 198; Parshall v. Klinck (N. Y.) 43 Barb. 203, 212; Fleming v. Hollenback (N. Y.) 7 Barb. 271, 278; Guyot v. Butts (N. Y.) 4 Wend. 579, 581; Berry v. Ross (Me.) 47 Atl. 512, 515; Glidden v. Dunlap, 28 Me. (15 Shep.) 379, 383; Bradish v. State, 35 Vt. 452, 456; Parker v. Hardy, 41 Mass. (24 Pick.) 240, 248; Gardner v. Mitchell, 23 Mass. (6 Pick.) 114, 116, 17 Am. Dec. 349; Chatfield v. Laythrop, Id. 417, 418; Van Riper v. Dundee Mfg. Co., 33 N. J. Law (4 Vroom) 152, 156; Winfield Building & Loan Ass'n v. McMullen, 53 Pac. 481, 59 Kan. 493; Layman v. Minneapolis St. Ry. Co., 69 N. W. 329, 66 Minn. 452; Waller v. Graves, 20 Conn. 305, 310; Richter v. Meyers, 5 Ind. App. 33, 35, 31 N. E. 582, 583; Vardeman v. Byrne, 8 Miss. (7 How.) 365, 369 (citing People v. Superior Court of City of New York [N. Y.] 10 Wend. 285); Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 5143; Pen. Code Ga. 1895, § 983; Code Civ. Proc. Cal. 1903, § 1838; Ann. Codes & Sts. Or. 1901, § 691; Price v. Brown, 1 Strange, 691. Though on the same point it may yet not be cumulative, but, if of the same kind, it is cumulative. Nor can we look to the effect of the new evidence in considering whether it is cumulative. If dissimilar to the previous evidence, it is not cumulative. If similar, it is cumulative. Grogan v. Chesapeake & O. Ry. Co., 39 W. Va. 415, 421, 19 S. E. 563. If it is of a different kind, though upon the same issue, or of the same kind upon a different issue, it is not cumulative. If verbal admissions have been testified to, other verbal admissions tending to establish the same question are cumulative. Cooper v. Ellis, 3 Ind. App. 142, 144, 29 N. E. 444 (citing Marshall v. Mathers, 103 Ind. 458, 3 N. E. 120). "That the new testimony is cumulative is clearly shown in the bill of exceptions, in which the court below say that it conduces to prove; thereby indicating, as we understand, contributing or tending to prove certain facts in relation to which some testimony had already been produced on the trial." Robins v. Fowler, 2 Ark. (2 Pike) 133, 145. Evidence which brings to life some new and independent truth of a different character, although it tends to prove the same proposition or ground of claim before insisted on, is not cumulative, within the true meaning of the rule. Anderson v. State, 43 Conn. 514, 519, 21 Am. Rep. 669. Evidence of verbal admissions is of the same kind when other verbal admissions to the same point were proved on the trial, but evidence to the same point is not cumulative where it is of a different kind or class. An admission testified to by a different witness, but being of the same class as that to which some of the evidence given on the trial belonged, and tending to prove the same fact as that which the evidence adduced on the trial tended to prove, is cumulative. Hines v. Driver, 100 Ind. 815, 327. The fact that newly discovered evidence may tend to prove the same issues upon which proof was offered at the trial does not necessarily make it cumulative, and whether or not it is cumulative is to be determined from its kind and character, rather than from its effect. Winfield Building & Loan Ass'n v. McMullen, 53 Pac. 481, 59 Kan. 493. Where the newly discovered evidence on which a motion for new trial was based was the finding of a bond, the signature of which was proved in the trial, and was the same as that on the bond after it was found, the bond constituted cumulative evidence. McMullen v. Winfield Building & Loan Ass'n, 46 Pac. 410, 412, 4 Kan. App. 459; Wynne v. Newman's Adm'r, 75 Va. 811, 817 (citing Guyot v. Butts [N. Y.] 4 Wend. 579).

Cumulative evidence is that which speaks as to facts in relation to which there was evidence on the trial. McGavock v. Brown, 23 Tenn. (4 Humph.) 251, 252; Shute v. Jones, 24 N. Y. Supp. 637.

Cumulative evidence is such as tends to support the same fact which was before attempted to be proved. Chatfield v. Lathrop, 23 Mass. (6 Pick.) 417, 418.

That evidence only is cumulative which is in addition to or corroborative of what has been given at the trial. Wall v. Trainor, 16 Nev. 131, 134. The rule excluding it must mean that new evidence to a subordinate point or fact is not competent when that subordinate or particular fact was before gone into, because it is then cumulative as to that fact; but if the newly discovered evidence brings to light some new fact bearing upon the main question, and it will be likely to change the result, it is not cumulative. Gray v. Harrison, 1 Nev. 502, 509.

Cumulative evidence is such as tends to support the fact or issue which was before attempted to be proved upon the trial. Olmstead v. Hill, 2 Ark. (2 Pike) 346, 353.

"Cumulative evidence," as used in the statement of the rule that a new trial will not be granted on the ground of newly discovered evidence which is merely cumulative, means evidence which goes to the fact principally controverted on the former trial, and respecting which the party asking for a new trial produced testimony on the trial of the cause. Roe v. Kalb, 37 Ga. 459, 464.

Cumulative evidence is additional evidence offered to establish a fact as to which witnesses have already testified. It does not necessarily include evidence which tends to establish the same ultimate or principally controverted fact. Dale v. State, 15 S. E. 287, 290, 88 Ga. 552; Able v. Frazier, 43 Iowa, 175, 177; Fellows v. State, 39 S. E. 885, 887, 114 Ga. 233. Thus where, in a defense of alibi, some witnesses testify that the defendant was at one place in a county, and others testified that he was at another place in the county, but both of them placed him at such a distance that he could not have been present at the time of the perpetration of the crime, the testimony of still another witness, who placed the accused in the county where the other witnesses located him, at a different place than any of them, is not merely cumulative, though it assists to establish the truth of the defense of alibi. Fellows v. State, 39 S. E. 885, 887, 114 Ga. 233.

Cumulative evidence is said to be additional evidence of the same kind or degree as that previously given, and upon the same point, which, in substance and effect, simply repeats or adds to what has before been testified. St. Joseph Folding Bed Co. v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co., 50 S. W. 85, 87, 148 Mo. 478.

It was held in People v. Leighton, 1 N. Y. Cr. R. 468, 469, that evidence is cumulative when it is of the same nature as that previously produced to establish the same fact or facts. Thus newly discovered evidence of the same nature as that previously produced to establish the same fact is cumulative, within the meaning of Code Cr. Proc. § 465, subd. 7, authorizing new trials for newly discovered evidence which is not cumulative. People v. O'Connor, 76 N. Y. Supp. 511, 512, 37 Misc. Rep. 754.

Evidence of new facts.

Evidence is cumulative if it relates to the same subordinate or specific fact to which proof was before adduced of a like character, but not when it is of a new fact respecting the general question or point in issue. Aiken v. Bemis (U. S.) 1 Fed. Cas. 229, 232.

Evidence of distinct and independent facts of a different character, though it may tend to establish the same ground or defense, or relate to the same issue, is not cumulative, within the rule. Waller v. Graves, 20 Conn. 305, 310; Layman v. Minneapolis St. Ry. Co., 69 N. W. 329, 66 Minn. 452. Thus where, in an action for personal injuries caused by a collision between a street car and a wagon, there was no evidence on the first trial that the driver of the wagon looked to see if a car was approaching before driving upon the track, evidence of that fact would not be cumulative evidence, though it would tend to disprove contributory negligence. Layman v. Minneapolis St. Ry. Co., 69 N. W. 329, 66 Minn. 452.

Testimony is not merely cumulative when it tends to prove a distinct fact not testified to at the trial, though other evidence may have been introduced by the moving party tending to support the same ground of claim or defense to which such fact is pertinent. Goldsworthy v. Town of Linden, 43 N. W. 656, 659, 75 Wis. 24.

The term "cumulative evidence" includes evidence tending merely to strengthen the proof as to any one or more particular facts already shown in evidence, but it does not include evidence of some other facts as to which there is no proof, but which would aid to the general conclusion. In a suit to have a bill of sale declared a mortgage, admissions by defendant that he held the instrument as security are not cumulative as to the particular facts tending to show that such was the intention or understanding of the parties, within the rule as to new trials for newly discovered evidence. Bullard v. Bullard, 84 N. W. 513, 514, 112 Iowa, 423.

Cumulative evidence is defined to be that which goes to prove what has already been established by other evidence. In a general sense, cumulative evidence may be considered to be such evidence as tends to strengthen or re-enforce evidence which has been received upon a given point or issue in the progress of the trial. But this rule is not of universal application, for, as said in Cole v. Cole (N. Y.) 50 How. Prac. 59, 61: "Evidence bearing on the same issue in a cause is scarcely ever of the same character. Very often the existence or nonexistence of the facts upon which the cause turns depends upon a number of other independent ones from which the former are inferred. When the alleged new evidence is of the same character with that offered upon the former trial, it is cumulative; but, when it tends to bear on a new fact made by the evidence on the pleadings, it is not." Where defendant was convicted of murder, notwithstanding the testimony of one M., corroborated by three witnesses, that one B. killed the deceased, newly discovered evidence purporting to show that M. did the killing is merely cumulative, as the issue on the trial was whether defendant or another did the killing, and the same issue would be raised by new evidence. People v. Shea, 38 N. Y. Supp. 821, 828, 16 Misc. Rep. 111.

CUMULATIVE OFFENSE.

A cumulative offense is an offense which can be committed only by a repetition of acts of the same kind, but committed on different days. The offense of being the "common seller" of intoxicating liquors is such an offense. Wells v. Commonwealth, 78 Mass. (12 Gray) 326, 328.

CUMULATIVE PUNISHMENT.

Cumulative punishment is an increased punishment inflicted for a second or third conviction under habitual criminal acts, and is to be distinguished from cumulative sentences, which are sentences pronounced upon a person under conviction at the same time for several offenses, one of which sentences is made to begin at the expiration of another. State v. Hamby, 35 S. E. 614, 615, 126 N. C. 1066.

CUMULATIVE REMEDY.

A cumulative remedy is defined by Bouvier as a remedy created by statute in addition to one which still remains in force. Where a statute gives a new remedy, and contains no negative, express or implied, of the old remedy, the new one provided by it is cumulative, and the party may elect between the two. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co. v. City of Chicago, 35 N. E. 881, 886, 148 Ill. 141, 160.

CUMULATIVE SENTENCE.

Cumulative sentences are not cumulative punishments, and a single sentence for several offenses in excess of that prescribed for one offense may be authorized by statute. Carter v. McLaughry, 22 Sup. Ct. 181, 193, 183 U. S. 365, 46 L. Ed. 236.

Where a sentence is made to begin at the expiration of another sentence imposed on the defendant, the practice is called "cumulative sentences." Such practice is universally recognized, except in a very few states. To hold that, where there are two convictions and judgments for imprisonment at the same term, both must commence immediately and be executed concurrently, would clearly be to nullify one of them. To postpone judgment in one case till the termination of the sentence in the other would, if allowable, be attended with inconvenience and expense, without any corresponding benefit to the convict. It should be noted that there is a difference between "cumulative sentences," such as are pronounced upon a person under conviction at the same time of several offenses, and "cumulative punishment," which is an increased punishment inflicted for a second or third conviction under habitual criminal acts. State v. Hamby, 35 S. E. 614, 126 N. C. 1066.

CUPOLA FURNACE.

A cupola furnace is one used for melting pig iron for the purpose of casting it into useful forms and articles. It constitutes part of the equipment of a foundry. In shape, it is generally a hollow cylinder. The iron is melted by substantially the same process as the ore in a blast furnace. The cupola furnace has an iron notch, but no cinder notch, because there is generally so little cinder or slag in pig iron as to render such an opening unnecessary. Vinton v. Hamilton, 104 U. S. 485, 488, 26 L. Ed. 807.

CURATIVE ACT.

A curative act, in the ordinary sense of that term, is a retrospective law acting on past causes and existing rights. Such laws are passed to validate irregularities in legal proceedings, or to give effect to contracts for failure to comply with technical legal requirements. Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 454. But there may be in legal proceedings defects which are not mere informalities or irregularities, and so vital in their character as to be beyond the reach of retrospective legislation. Such defects are called jurisdictional. Laws 1885, c. 448, making a comptroller's tax deed, after the lapse of two years from record, conclusive evidence of the regularity of the sale and all proceedings prior thereto, and providing that such tax deeds and all outstanding tax certificates in force after two years from the last day for redemption shall be conclusive evidence of the regularity of the sale and of all notices required to be given previous to the expiration of the period of redemption, is not, as to the party in actual possession, a curative act, but a statute of limitations, and therefore sufficient to create defects which a curative statute would have been unable to reach. Meigs v. Roberts, 56 N. E. 838-840, 162 N. Y. 371, 76 Am. St. Rep. 322.

CURATOR.

The word "curator," when applied to the care of an estate, merely, means the same as "guardian"; and the fact that an order of appointment designates the appointee as curator of an insane person instead of guardian, in the words of 2 Rev. St. 1879, § 5791, providing for the appointment of a "guardian for the person and estate of an insane person," is immaterial. Easley v. Bone, 39 Mo. App. 388, 391.

A curator is a person who has been legally appointed to take care of the interests of one who, on account of his youth or defects of his understanding, or for some other cause, is unable to attend to them himself. In the civil law the term "curator" is employed for "guardian," but by the common law a guardian is one who has been lawfully invested with the care of the person of an infant, or as representative of his interest. Larned v. Renshaw, 37 Mo. 458, 460.

The term "curator" is used in the civil law to designate the person having the care of the estate of an infant. Sproule v. Davies, 75 N. Y. Supp. 229, 230, 69 App. Div. 502.

A curator, in the civil law, is the guardian of the estate of a ward, as distinguished from the guardian of his person. Duncan v. Crook, 49 Mo. 116, 117.

CURATOR AD HOC.

Where it appears that an attorney has been appointed curator ad hoc, the phrase "curator ad hoc" will be treated as surplusage, and the appointment be regarded as that of attorney to represent the absentee. Hall v. Laurence, 21 La. Ann. 692, 693.

CURATORSHIP.

A "curatorship" differs from an "administration," in that the latter continues in full force until a final settlement occurs, and meanwhile the executor or administrator represents the heirs and creditors of the decedent; but, where the minor comes of age, the event terminates the curatorship as to all things except the settlement between the minor and the incumbent curator. State ex rel. Scott v. Greer, 74 S. W. 881, 883, 101 Mo. App. 669.

CURBSTONES.

A city ordinance provided that, when any sidewalks should be established, the commissioner of highways should grade the same, set the curbstones, pave the gutters, and construct the sidewalk, and the abutting owners should be assessed therefor their just and proportionate part of the expense of paving the walk, but that no part of the expense of grading the street, setting the curbstones, or paving the gutters should be so assessed, but should be paid for by the city. Held, that the word "curbstones" meant the curbstones between the sidewalk and that part of the street devoted to carriage travel. Dickinson v. City Council of Worcester, 138 Mass. 555, 562.

CURE.

"Cured," as used in the rule that a mariner is entitled to be cured of sickness and wounds received in the service of the ship, is not to be taken in an absolute sense, as that would involve impossibilities. The term "cured" here was doubtless employed originally in the sense of "taking charge" or "care of" the disabled seaman, and not in that of positive healing. The City of Alexandria (U. S.) 17 Fed. 390, 394.

CURE OF SOULS.

Rev. St. c. 71, providing that all regular ministers of the gospel, of every denomination, having the "cure of souls," shall be authorized to solemnize the rites of matrimony according to the rites and ceremonies of their respective churches, and agreeably to the rules in the act prescribed, does not imply a necessity that the minister should be the incumbent of a church living, or the pastor of any congregation or congregations in particular; but those terms import that the person is to be something more than a minister or preacher, merely, and that he has faculty, according to the constitution of his church, to celebrate matrimony, and to some extent, at least, has the power to administer the Christian sacraments, as acknowledged and held by his church. State v. Bray, 35 N. C. 289, 290.

CURED BY VERDICT.

The expression "cured by verdict" signifies that the court will, after a verdict, presume that the particular thing omitted or defectively stated in the pleadings was duly proved at the trial. State v. Keena, 28 Atl. 522, 63 Conn. 329; Treanor v. Houghton, 36 Pac. 1081, 1083, 103 Cal. 53; Merrick v. Trustees of Bank of Metropolis (Md.) 8 Gill, 59, 75; Alford v. Baker, 53 Ind. 279, 283; Peck v. Martin, 17 Ind. 115, 117. Such intentment must arise not merely from the verdict, but from the united effect of the verdict and the issues upon which the verdict was given. And the particular thing which is presumed to have been proved must always be such as can be implied from the allegations of the records by fair and reasonable intentment. Jackson v. Pesked, 1 Maule & S. 234. Under such ruling, an information which fails to state an offense cannot be cured by verdict. State v. Keena, 28 Atl. 522, 63 Conn. 329. It is based on the principle that where there is any defect, imperfection, or omission in any pleading, whether in substance or form, which would have been a fatal objection upon demurrer, yet if the issue joined be such as necessarily required on the trial proof of the facts so defectively or imperfectly stated or omitted, and without which it is not to be presumed that either the judge would direct the jury to give, or the jury would have given, the verdict, such defect, imperfection, or omission is cured by the verdict. Treanor v. Houghton, 36 Pac. 1081, 1083, 103 Cal. 53.

CURRENT.

In the Century Dictionary, "current" is defined as "a very small kind of raisin or dried grape imported from the Levant—chiefly from Zante and Cephalonia—and used in cooking." Precisely the same definition is given in Webster's International Dictionary, issue of 1890. In the Encyclopædia Britannica (Ed. 1877) the following definition is found: "Current. The dried, seedless fruit of a variety of the grapevine (vitis vinifera) cultivated principally in Zante, Cephalonia, Ithaca, and near Patras, in the Morea." In the Standard Dictionary of the English Language, published in 1895, a "current" is defined to be a small, seedless raisin, imported from the Levant, and called usually "dried currants" and "Zante currants." Zante Currants (U. S.) 73 Fed. 183, 187.

CURRENCY.

See "Bankable Currency"; "Canada Currency"; "Common Currency"; "Continental Currency"; "Lawful Currency"; "National Currency"; "Paper Currency"; "United States Currency."

In a note the term "currency" evidently means that the note is not payable in coin or in notes of the United States, which are made legal tender for all debts, but describes some other medium of circulation. Huse v. Hamblin, 29 Iowa, 501, 505, 4 Am. Rep. 244.

Courts judicially take notice in what light the medium or subject-matter of payment of a note or bill is regarded in common understanding, and, where a bill or note is made payable in currency, the value of the currency at the time of payment must be ascertained in the same manner as the value of any other commodity. Therefore an instrument in the form of a bill of exchange, except that it is drawn payable in currency, is not a bill of exchange, within the meaning of statutes defining negotiable instruments. Farwell v. Kennett, 7 Mo. 595, 597.

"Currency" does not necessarily mean money, but whatever circulates conventionally on its own credit as a medium of exchange, whether it be bank notes, bills of exchange, or government securities, which, being thus practically current, are properly currency. Griswold v. Hepburn, 63 Ky. (2 Duv.) 20, 33.

The word "currency" is defined in Bouvier's Law Dictionary to mean money which passes at a fixed value from hand to hand. Butler v. Paine, 8 Minn. 324, 328 (Gil. 284).

2 Wms. & P.—50

"Currency" is a word of exclusive application. It means, among other uses, a continual passing from hand to hand and circulation, as the currency of coin, bank bills, bills of credit, etc. As applied to contracts to pay money, it must be understood in the sense in which the parties intended it, if their intention can be ascertained. Carlisle v. Davis, 7 Ala. 42, 44.

The meaning of the phrase "currency used in the common business" of the country, in a bond dated in Virginia on the 30th day of March, 1864, to be paid, with interest, three years from date, in the currency used in the common business of the country at the date of the maturity, is to be determined by parol evidence showing the understanding of the parties in respect to the kind of currency in which the same was to be performed, or with reference to which, as the standard of value, it was made and entered into. Calbreath v. Virginia Porcelain & Earthenware Co. (Va.) 22 Grat. 697, 701.

"Currency," when applied to the medium of trade, means equally coin, bank notes, or notes issued by the government. Leonard v. State, 22 South. 564, 565, 115 Ala. 80 (citing Crocker v. State, 47 Ala. 53; Noble v. State, 59 Ala. 73, 81).

The word "currency," when applied to the medium of trade, means coin, bank notes, or notes issued by the government. Crocker v. State, 47 Ala. 53. When the charge is made, therefore, that the defendant stole $60 in United States currency, it means, by common understanding, that that amount of money, in coin, bank notes, or notes issued by the government of the United States, was stolen by him. Leonard v. State, 115 Ala. 80, 82, 22 South. 564, 565.

As bank bills or notes.

"Currency" is defined as "bank notes or other paper money issued by authority, which are continually used as and for coin." This is also the commercial as well as the popular meaning of the term. Chicago Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Keiron, 27 Ill. (17 Peck) 501, 505; Osgood v. McConnell, 32 Ill. 74, 77; Klauber v. Biggerstaff, 3 N. W. 357, 359, 47 Wis. 551, 32 Am. Rep. 773; Springfield Marine & Fire Ins. Co. v. Tincher, 30 Ill. (20 Peck) 399, 403.

Currency is defined in Wharton's Law Lex, 236, as bank notes or other paper money which are continually passing as a circulating medium. This view is substantially followed by the Supreme Court of Illinois. Galena Ins. Co. v. Kupfer, 28 Ill. (18 Peck) 332, 81 Am. Dec. 284, where the judge, delivering his opinion, says: "Currency is bank bills or other paper money which passes as a circulating medium in the business community as and for the constitutional coin of the country. The term 'current funds,' means current money, par funds, or money circulating without any discount. These definitions are too restrictive. Currency is a circulating medium, and is generally used—and, indeed, is so defined by Worcester—to indicate the grade of coin, bills, notes, etc., in circulation, as a metal currency, a mixed currency, a paper currency. What, then, does a note or bill payable in currency call for? It calls for payment in anything which circulates current as money. If gold and silver are circulating as money, they are currency. If bank notes are circulating as money, they are currency. Thus currency may be composed of either coin or paper, or both. What 'currency' means, in a note or bill, is not very clear, without some reference to the circulating medium at the time, or without knowing what meaning is attached to the word generally by those who use it, or, rather, without knowing what specific idea the word is used to express. On questions of mercantile construction we have frequently followed the direction of Tindal, C. J., in Houghton v. Gilbrat, 7 C. & P. 701: 'You had better set aside your dictionary and appeal to the knowledge of the jury, for, after all, the dictionary is not authority.' Pilmer v. Branch of State Bank, 16 Iowa, 321, 329.

"Currency" means what passes among the people, and is made by them to answer in some degree the purpose of money, so that a bond calling for current bank money meant current bank bills for the amount specified. Lackey v. Miller, 61 N. C. 26, 28.

In a note payable "in the currency of the country, but not Confederate notes" the terms "currency" and "current bank notes" are synonymous, and mean payable in those bank notes which might circulate currently when the note became due. Coffin v. Hill, 48 Tenn. (1 Helsk.) 383, 388.

In the dissenting opinion of Justice Clifford in the Legal Tender Cases, "currency" is defined as "a word much more comprehensive than the word money, as it may include bank bills, and even bills of exchange, as well as coins of gold and silver." Knox v. Lee, 79 U. S. (12 Wall.) 457, 607, 20 L. Ed. 287.

As coin or equivalent.

"Currency" means of the value of cash, and excludes the idea of depreciated paper money; and, if taken as and for coin, such is its value. Swift v. Whitney, 20 Ill. (10 Peck) 144, 146.

Currency is coin, or such bank notes as pass freely in commercial transactions as money, and are regarded as equivalent to coin. Webster v. Pierce, 35 Ill. 158, 164.

A note payable in current money does not mean bank notes, but gold or silver. The word "current," preceding the word "money," cannot change its meaning, because it is equally applicable to that kind of money made current by the act of Congress, which is the only current money of Kentucky. "Current money" does not mean the same thing as "currency." McChord v. Ford, 19 Ky. (3 T. B. Mon.) 166, 167.

Where a note is payable "in currency," that term means that the designated number of dollars is payable in an equal number of notes which are current in the community as dollars, and are the opposite of the term "in specie," meaning that the note shall be paid in so many gold or silver dollars of the coin of the United States. Treblcock v. Wilson, 79 U. S. (12 Wall.) 687, 695, 20 L. Ed. 460.

As current money.

The term "currency," as used in a note declaring that it should be paid in currency, means current money. Dugan v. Campbell, 1 Ohio (1 Ham.) 115, 119.

Authorities hold that the term "currency," used in commercial paper, ex vi termini, means money, so that paper payable in currency is negotiable. In Michigan it was held that, where a certificate of deposit was made payable in currency, prima facie, at least, that must be held to mean money current by law, or paper equivalent in value, circulating in the business community at par; such being the general signification, the fair import, and the ordinary legal effect of the term. Hatch v. First Nat. Bank, 47 Atl. 908, 909, 94 Me. 348, 80 Am. St. Rep. 401 (citing Phelps v. Town, 14 Mich. 374; Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Allen, 11 Mich. 501, 83 Am. Dec. 756; Black v. Ward, 27 Mich. 191, 15 Am. Rep. 162).

Plaintiff sent to the defendants for collection certain bills which on their face were payable in currency. Defendant collected them in the treasury notes of the then so-called Confederate States, and held these identical notes, and tendered them to the plaintiff as the proceeds of the collection. The plaintiff refused to receive them, and demanded legal currency. The result of the controversy depends upon the construction to be placed on the words "in currency," used in the bills, for, if the defendants are correct in their interpretation of the words, the plaintiff would have no standing in court. When the words in instruments may convey two different meanings—the one in harmony with, and the other antagonistic to, the law—the former should always, upon principle, be adopted, because in that sense the legal effect can be given to the instrument, while the other would render it nugatory. The words "in currency," in the bills which the defendants undertook to collect for the plaintiff, mean current money, in the legal sense. If the parties intended to attach a different meaning to them, the instruments themselves should show it, which they do not, and the defendants were not authorized to receive in payment anything but legal currency. Fry v. Dudley, 20 La. Ann. 368, 371, 372.

As money.

Currency is not necessarily money, but whatever circulates conventionally on its own credit as a medium of exchange—whether it be bank notes, bills of exchange, or government securities, being those practically current—is within the term “currency”; but such currency, merely spontaneous, is not money, which is the legal medium of exchange, and the only true standard of value. Griswold v. Hephurn, 63 Ky. (2 Duv.) 20, 23.

“Currency,” as used in a draft made payable in currency, means the established lawful standard medium of exchange, legal tender money, or gold or silver. Butler v. Paine, 8 Minn. 324, 329 (Gil. 284, 289).

Where a note is payable in currency, it is, in legal contemplation, payable in money. Trowbridge v. Seamen, 21 Ill. (11 Peck) 101.

The word “currency” is not confined in meaning to paper which is not money. The only cases in which it has been held that currency does not mean money, except where it has been qualified by some further definition, are some cases in Iowa and Wisconsin, all of which rest entirely upon the authority of decisions where the papers in question were expressly payable in bank notes. Neither of these definitions supports the idea that “currency” and “bank notes” are purely convertible terms, and the inference is unwarranted, unless founded on what does not appear in any of these decisions. Black v. Ward, 27 Mich. 191–194, 15 Am. Rep. 162.

As paper money.

The term “currency” is not limited to metallic currency issued by the United States government, but extends as well to paper money issued by or under the authority of Congress. Juillard v. Greenman, 4 Sup. Ct. 122, 130, 110 U. S. 421, 28 L. Ed. 204.

“Currency may be properly defined as something which circulates as a medium of trade. It conveys at the present time the idea of paper money of some sort.” State v. Gasting, 23 La. Ann. 609, 610.

CURRENCY OF THE STATE.

The terms “currency of this state” or “current bank paper of this state,” and all other such terms, clearly mean bank notes and are distinguishable from the term “good current money of this state,” which means the current coin of the United States. Willburn v. Greer, 6 Ark. (1 Eng.) 255, 258 (citing Graham v. Adams, 5 Ark. [5 Pike] 261, 262).

Of Illinois.

A certificate stated that plaintiffs had deposited in the bank $1,781.42, “Ill. Cy.,” payable to the order of themselves on the return of the certificate. The fair construction of the terms “Ill. Cy.”—taking it for granted that these terms meant “Illinois currency”—is that, if applied to the payment of this certificate, the same might be paid in bills of banks which at the time of payment were received and passed as ordinary currency in the state in ordinary transactions of business, and would not necessarily permit of payment in the same bills which were received by the defendants. Hulbert v. Carver (N. Y.) 37 Barb. 62, 63.

A certificate of deposit payable in Illinois currency means “bills passing in the locality in the place of coin.” Chicago Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Kelron, 27 Ill. (17 Peck) 501, 505.

A letter of advice from a bank stating “I hereby credit your account with” a certain number of dollars “in Illinois currency” cannot be construed to mean that the account is payable in Illinois currency, but the depositor is entitled to the number of dollars expressed in the letter of advice. Marine Bank v. Birney, 28 Ill. (18 Peck) 90–92.

Of Kentucky.

“Currency of Kentucky,” in common acceptance, would not be understood to mean anything else than the common circulating medium in the state, and therefore would include a bank note which might at any time have been converted into money, and was in fact, in the common understanding of the community, the currency of Kentucky. Lampton v. Haggard, 19 Ky. (3 T. B. Mon.) 149, 150.

A note for the payment of £50 current money of Kentucky in cash, or in cash notes, is a note for the payment of cash or of cash notes, within the act of Assembly creating the summary mode of recovering debts, and of confining it expressly to notes or bonds for the direct payment of money. Louden v. Kenney, 4 Ky. (1 Bibb) 330.

Of Missouri.

“Currency of this state,” in a note, imports either, first, gold or silver coin, which is the constitutional currency of the United States, the “tender money” of the several states of the Union; or, second, the notes of the Bank of the State of Missouri, the issuing of which is authorized by the laws of the state, and cannot be construed to mean the notes of the several banks incorporated by the laws of other states. Cockrill v. Kirkpatrick, 9 Mo. 697, 701.

Of Mississippi.

Properly speaking, the term “currency of the state of Mississippi,” as used in a promissory note payable in such currency, can only mean that which has been declared to be a legal tender, because “currency” implies lawful money. Wharton v. Morris (Pa.) 1 Dall. 125, 126, 1 L. Ed. 65. In a suit for lawful money, paper money, unless shown to be a legal tender, will not be permitted to be brought into court; and, where payment of such note was tendered in the notes of the Mississippi Railroad Company, the tender was insufficient. Mitchell v. Hewitt, 13 Miss. (5 Smedes & M.) 361, 366.

CURRENT.

See "Alternated Current"; "Alternating Current."

The term "current," as defined by the Century Dictionary, means "running; moving; following; passing; present in its course, as the current month or year." Other standard authorities give the word about the same definition, and, as applied to current funds of the state, it means funds, the amount of which is constantly changing by reason of receipts and disbursements therein. State v. Bartley, 58 N. W. 172, 174, 39 Neb. 353, 23 L. R. A. 67.

"Current," as used in an indictment charging the robbery of several promissory notes then and there of the "currency current" in said commonwealth, is equivalent to "current as money in the commonwealth," and hence would be sustained by proof that the notes stolen were either bank bills or treasury notes. Commonwealth v. Griffiths, 126 Mass. 252, 253.

The words "bank notes current in the city of New York," as used in a promissory note payable in "bank notes current in the city of New York," make the note negotiable, for the court will take notice that notes current in the city of New York are of cash value throughout the state, and are distinguished by those words from other bank notes which are received at a discount; and hence it is immaterial whether the notes of banks in other states might be tendered in payment, provided they were current in the city of New York, as in that case they are considered as cash, equally with the current bills of the state. The note, if payable in bank notes generally, would have been valid, and consequently it is valid when confined to a species of bank paper of known cash value. Judah v. Harris (N. Y.) 19 Johns. 144, 145.

"Current" means circulatory, common, popular, which may all be with money, without a law of the United States or any law, and as it respects some kinds of silver coin, until the late act of Congress, was so in fact. An allegation in an indictment that coins intended to be counterfeited "were current silver coins of this state and of the United States" is not equivalent to the words in the statute, "which shall be made current by the laws of this or the United States." State v. Bowman, 6 Vt. 594, 597.

CURRENT ACCOUNT.

A current account, as used in the statute, is a running, passing, connected series. Tucker v. Quimby, 37 Iowa, 17, 19.

A current account is one in which there has not been a balance agreed on and struck between the parties. Franklin v. Camp's Ex'rs, 1 N. J. Law (Coxe) 196.

The expression "account current," in the mercantile sense, is an account which contains items of debit and credit between the parties, from which the balance due one or the other is or can be ascertained. Wilson v. Calvert, 18 Ala. 274, 276.

A mutual, open, and current account, within Code Civ. Proc. § 344, providing that an action on such account shall be deemed to have accrued, for the purpose of computing limitations, from the date of the last item only, arises when there are mutual charges between the parties which may be offset, and does not rise from the mere fact of payments made on an account in favor of one of the parties. Rocca v. Klein, 16 Pac. 323, 74 Cal. 526.

Gen. St. c. 66, § 9, provides a limitation of actions founded on mutual, "open, and current accounts." Held, that a mutual, open, and current account, within the statute, was an account which was mutual; i. e., that each party had an account against the other, open and current; i. e., unsettled, not closed or stated, but running. There must be reciprocal demands between the parties; that is, cross-demands—something on which either party could sustain an action. Taylor v. Parker, 17 Minn. 469, 473 (Gil. 447, 451).

An account showing on one side items for goods sold and delivered at different dates, and only payments made by the purchaser on the other side, is not an "open, current" account, within the statute of limitations, and its operation is not suspended, as respects the earlier items of the account, until the date of the last item proved therein. Cousins v. St. Paul, M. & M. Ry. Co., 45 N. W. 429, 43 Minn. 219.

In order that an account may be held to be an open account current, within Pub. St. c. 197, § 8, declaring that the statute of limitations shall begin to run on such an account from the date of the last item proved, it must be an account of mutual dealings between the parties, consisting of sales made or services performed by each party to or for the other, creating mutual debts and parts of one kind. There must be a mutual agreement, express or implied, that the items of the account on the one side and the other are to be set against each other. In other words, there must be one account upon which the items on either side belong, and upon which they operate to extinguish each other pro tanto, so that the balance on either side is the debt between the parties, and therefore not a suit by a surviving partner on an account within the statute for the hire and keeping of horses. Medical services rendered by defendant to plaintiff subsequent to the death of the other partner do not create such a mutual dealing between the parties as would take the case out of the statute. Eldridge v. Smith, 144 Mass. 35, 36, 10 N. E. 717, 718.

A shopkeeper's account containing charges of articles sold to the defendants, some of them within six years before action brought, and also containing credits given more than six years before action brought, is not a current or mutual account, so that the charges within the six years should draw the previous charges out of the statute of limitations. Gold v. Whitcomb, 81 Mass. (14 Pick.) 188.

CURRENT BANK BILL.

"Current bank bills" means bank bills or other paper money which passes as a circulating medium in the business community as and for the constitutional coin of the country. It is synonymous with "currency." Osgood v. McConnell, 32 Ill. 74.

CURRENT BANK MONEY.

"Current bank money," as used in a bond promising to pay an amount named in "current bank money," will be construed to mean "current bank bills." Lackey v. Miller, 61 N. C. 28, 28.

A note payable in current bank money of the state of Mississippi means that species of money called "Mississippi bank notes," and not coin, such as gold and silver, and the measure of damages for failure to pay such a note is the value of current Mississippi bank notes at the time the note was payable. Hopson v. Fountain, 24 Tenn. (5 Humph.) 140, 141.

CURRENT BANK NOTES.

The statute which authorizes judgment to be rendered for bank notes specifically means current bank notes of Kentucky. Speak v. Warner, 28 Ky. (5 J. J. Marsh.) 68.

Current bank notes are not a legal tender, and are neither gold nor silver, but are the representatives of both. They are included in the term "money" in the statute making all bonds, promissory notes, etc., drawn for any sum or sums of money, certain, and payable to any person or order, or any person or bearer, etc., negotiable by indorsement. Swetland v. Creigh, 15 Ohio, 118-121.

A bill for the payment in current bank notes of $629 cannot mean that amount in gold and silver coin, for then the words are perfectly inoperative and useless. It was either intended that as many current bank notes should be paid as are equivalent in market value to the sum in gold and silver, or as are equal in denomination or in nominal amount to that sum. It is the same thing, substantially, as if the expression had been "six hundred and twenty-nine dollars," instead of "in current bank notes." Gamble v. Hatton, 7 Tenn. (Peck) 130.

Current bank notes are notes or bills used in general circulation as money, constituting the general currency of the country, and recognized by law at the time and place where payment of a debt was to be made and demanded. Pardee v. Fish, 60 N. Y. 265, 270, 19 Am. Rep. 176.

"The term 'current bank notes,' when used in notes and obligations, imports generally such as are convertible into gold and silver at par." Williams v. Arnis, 30 Tex. 37, 40.

As used in a note payable in current Tennessee bank notes, the words "current bank notes" mean that which circulates currently as money, and which, in business, is presumed to be of equal value to money. Baker v. Jordan, 24 Tenn. (5 Humph.) 485, 486.

Current bank notes have been defined as such as are convertible into specie at the counter where they were issued, and pass at par, in the ordinary transactions of the country. Bizzell v. Brewer, 9 Ark. (4 Eng.) 58, 61.

The term "current bank notes" embraces in its ordinary acceptation such bank notes only as are redeemable in gold and silver, or are equivalent thereto in the nearest commercial mart. Fleming v. Nall, 1 Tex. 246, 247.

A note payable in current bank notes is not negotiable paper. Simpson v. Moulden, 43 Tenn. (3 Cold.) 429, 431; Kirkpatrick v. McCullough, 22 Tenn. (3 Humph.) 171, 172, 39 Am. Dec. 158.

CURRENT BANK PAPER.

"The term 'current bank paper' means paper which passes from hand to hand as money, and does not mean depreciated bank paper, which is bought and sold as merchandise." Pierson v. Wallace, 7 Ark. (2 Eng.) 282, 293.

The term "currency of this state," or "current bank paper of this state," and all other such terms, clearly mean bank notes, and are distinguishable from the term "good, current money of this state," which means the current coin of the United States. Wilburn v. Greer, 6 Ark. (1 Eng.) 255-258.

CURRENT BILLS.

As cash, see "Cash."

The term "current bills," as used in a note declaring that the same shall be payable in "current bills," is to be understood as meaning current bank bills, or bills which, in the ordinary course of business by a conventional arrangement in the community, and for the purpose of business, are treated as money. Collins v. Lincoln, 11 Vt. 268, 269.

CURRENT EXPENSES.

See "Ordinary Current Expenses."

Of county.

"Current expenses of the year," as used in a statute authorizing a county board of supervisors to levy a tax for the "current expenses of the year," should be construed to mean the "expenses of the current year." The adjective was meant to qualify the latter word, and hence the board had power to levy taxes for the payment of expenses incurred within a particular year, though for buildings, etc., which was not a current expense in the sense that it was one that occurred every year, or from year to year, as the erection of a jail. Babcock v. Goodrich, 47 Cal. 488, 510.

"Current county expenditures" do not mean county expenditures for years other than the year for which the taxes are levied, and warrants issued in other years are not receivable in payment of taxes in any other year than that in which the warrant is issued, unless there be an excess of revenue after paying the current expenses to the county for such year. Then the excess may be applied to the payment of outstanding warrants as presented in the payment of county taxes, or they may be paid by the county treasurer out of any funds in his hands for the purpose. State ex rel. Egger v. Payne, 52 S. W. 412, 414, 151 Mo. 663.

The erection of county buildings is not "current expenses" of a county, but is an extraordinary and exceptional expense. When permanent county buildings are once erected and completed, the benefits to the county are permanent and continuous; and while the erection of such buildings is a county charge and expense, in the sense that the county, under proper conditions, must pay the cost of them, it is not a part of the current expenses of the county. State v. Marion County Com'rs, 21 Kan. 419, 434.

Of property.

"Current expenses," as the term is used in a contract whereby the trustees of certain property agreed to pay over all the money received into their hands as trustees, "after paying therefrom all taxes and current expenses of such property in trust, actually imposed or incurred," means ordinary expenses. Taylor v. Mayo, 4 Sup. Ct. 147, 151, 110 U. S. 330, 28 L. Ed. 163.

Of railroads.

Current expenses of a railroad company in the hands of a receiver in mortgage foreclosure proceedings are those incurred within a reasonable time. Thomas v. Peoria & R. I. R. Co. (U. S.) 36 Fed. 808, 819.

Of schools.

"Current expenses," as used in regard to common schools, means continuing, regular expenditures for the maintenance of the schools; and hence a fund devoted to the payment of current expenses cannot be appropriated to the building of a new school-house, or for the purchasing of the site. Sheldon v. Purdy, 49 Pac. 228, 230, 17 Wash. 135.

The words "current expenses," as used in a resolution for a school tax, denote one of the purposes for which a tax may be ordered, and are sufficiently definite, and are identical with "running expenses." State v. Board of Education of Neptune, 53 Atl. 236, 237, 68 N. J. Law, 496.

The phrase "current expenses" is identical in signification with the phrase "running expenses," and denotes the purpose for which a school tax may be levied. State v. Board of Education of Neptune City, 53 Atl. 236, 237, 68 N. J. Law, 496.

CURRENT FUNDS.

"Current funds" signifies cash, or paper money equivalent thereto. Wood v. Price, 46 Ill. 435, 437.

A note payable in current funds is payable in money. Haddock v. Woods, 46 Iowa, 433, 435.

A promissory note read, "One day after date we promise to pay E. C., or order. $1,234.40, for value received, payable in current funds." Held, that the note being perfect, as a money demand, without the addition of the words "payable in current funds," the addition of these words meant that the same should be paid in any funds other than money, making the note a contract to pay in current paper funds. Conwell v. Pumphrey, 9 Ind. 135, 138, 68 Am. Dec. 611.

Bank notes.

"Current funds," as used in certificates of deposit payable in current funds, should be construed to include all funds bankable in the state, and any such funds would answer the description and satisfy the contract. A tender in any of the notes of the banks of the state passing as currency would discharge the obligation. Platt v. Sauk County Bank, 17 Wis. 222, 227.

Certificates of deposit.

The modern and better doctrine is that the term "current funds," when used in commercial transactions as the expression of the medium of payment, should be construed to mean current money—funds which are current by law as money—and that, when thus considered, a certificate of deposit payable in current funds is in this respect negotiable. It is well known that certificates of deposit are commonly made payable in currency or in current funds, and the interpretation given is in accord with the universal understanding of parties giving and receiving these instruments. Hatch v. First Nat. Bank, 47 Atl. 908, 909, 94 Me. 348, 80 Am. St. Rep. 401.

As current money.

The term "current funds," when used in a draft, bill of exchange, or promissory note, means whatever is receivable and current by law as money, whether in the form of notes or coin. Bull v. First Nat. Bank, 8 Sup. Ct. 62, 64, 123 U. S. 105, 31 L. Ed. 97.

"Current funds," as used in a bill payable in funds current in the city of New York, meant gold or silver, or something equivalent to it, and convertible at pleasure into those metals. Lacy v. Holbrook, 4 Ala. 88, 90.

"Current funds," as used in a note payable in current funds, does not mean specie, but the representative of it. Parol evidence is admissible to show the species of current funds in which payment was intended by the parties. In the absence of evidence, they will be construed to mean funds that are convertible into gold and silver at par. Williams v. Arnis, 30 Tex. 37, 49.

As funds circulating at par.

The term "current funds" or "currency" has a specific legal and well-known meaning, to wit, current money of par value, or money circulating without any discount. Hence a check payable in current funds cannot be paid by tender of depreciated bank currency. Marc v. Kupfer, 34 Ill. 286, 293; Galena Ins. Co. v. Kupfer, 28 Ill. (18 Peck) 332, 335, 81 Am. Dec. 284.

The phrase "current funds," as employed in commercial transactions, has a fixed and known signification, meaning current money, lawful money, or funds or money circulating without any discount. State v. Bartley, 58 N. W. 172, 174, 39 Neb. 353, 23 L. R. A. 67.

As funds current by law.

"Current funds," when used in a note which is made payable in current funds, means such funds as are current by law, in the absence of evidence showing that the words were used in some other sense. Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Allen, 11 Mich. 501, 508, 83 Am. Dec. 756.

nix Ins. Co. v. Allen, 11 Mich. 501, 508, 83 Am. Dec. 756.

"Current funds," as used in a bill of exchange or other negotiable instrument to denote the form of payment, means any funds which are made legal tender by law. Kirkwood v. First Nat. Bank, 58 N. W. 1016, 1018, 40 Neb. 484, 24 L. R. A. 444, 42 Am. St. Rep. 683.

As affecting negotiability of note.

Commercial paper payable in current funds or in currency is not negotiable, since it is not payable in money, or what the court is reasonably bound to consider as equivalent to money. Lindsey v. McClelland, 18 Wis. 481, 484, 86 Am. Dec. 786 (citing Ford v. Mitchell, 15 Wis. 304).

Where a note was payable in current funds at Pittsburgh, due in 1838, such funds meant funds which were generally current in business transactions in that city, and, that being a currency that had to be valued, such note was not negotiable. Wright v. Hart's Adm'r, 44 Pa. (8 Wright) 454, 457.

The words "in current funds," as used in a check, mean nothing more or less than current money; and, so construed, the fact that they are contained in the check does not render it nonnegotiable. Laird v. State, 61 Md. 309, 311.

Where a note is payable in current funds, parol evidence is admissible to show that the use of such words, according to a custom prevailing at the time and place of the execution of the note, renders it negotiable. American Emigrant Co. v. Clark, 47 Iowa, 671, 672.

Of state.

Laws 1891, § 1, declares that the State Treasurer shall deposit, and at all times keep on deposit, in the state and national banks, or some of them, the amounts of money in his hands belonging to the several current funds in the state treasury. Held, that the phrase "current funds," used in such statute, was not employed by the Legislature in the sense in which the term is usually used in commercial dealings, namely, current money, lawful money, par funds, etc., but that the term "current funds," like many other words in the English language, is susceptible of more than one meaning, and, as employed by the Legislature, was used to designate divisions of public money of the state into the various divisions in which it is divided by law. State v. Bartley, 58 N. W. 172, 174, 39 Neb. 353, 23 L. R. A. 67.

"Our law recognizes nothing as current funds of the state of Ohio but gold and silver coin, and bank notes issued by banks incorporated by the state, which are by law required to be of equal value with gold and silver coin in the same denomination. A note payable in current funds of the state of Ohio is a sum certain, within the meaning of the statute providing that a promissory note for the payment of a sum of money certain to the payee or order shall be negotiable by indorsement." White v. Richmond, 16 Ohio St. 5-7.

Of the United States.

Where one contracted to deliver $10,000, current funds of the United States, at 15 cents on the dollar, the phrase "current funds of the United States" mean $10,000 legal tender notes. Cooke v. Davis, 53 N. Y. 318, 321.

CURRENT MONEY.

See "Good Current Money."

Where a contract provided that money was to be paid in "current, lawful money," the words "current, lawful money" mean such money as is current at the time of entering into the contract. Lee v. Biddis (Pa.) 1 Dall. 175, 1 L. Ed. 88.

Where the statute declares that the species of coins which have been and which may be struck at the mint of the United States, and the rates of foreign coins as have been or shall be severally regulated and established by Congress, shall be taken and recognized as the currency of the state, and that all accounts of the state shall be expressed in dollars and cents, an indictment charging that the property stolen was worth so many dollars in current money means that it was so many dollars of the coin of the United States; the addition of the word "current" adding nothing to the meaning. Gardner v. State, 25 Md. 146, 150.

Bank paper is not current money. Burnett v. Commonwealth, 20 Ky. (4 T. B. Mon.) 106, 108.

As coin.

A note payable in good, current money of the state is payable in gold and silver only. Graham v. Adams, 5 Ark. (5 Pike) 261, 262.

"Current money," as used in an instrument requiring the payment of a debt in current money, means tender money or constitutional coin. Bainbridge v. Owen, 25 Ky. (2 J. J. Marsh.) 463, 464.

"Current money," as used in a note promising to pay $700, "current money of Kentucky," means gold or silver. The word "current," preceding the word "money," cannot change its meaning, because it is equally applicable to that kind of money made current by act of Congress, which in truth is the only current money of Kentucky. "Current money" does not mean the same thing as "currency," and in this case would not mean bank notes, as they have been held not to be money. McChord v. Ford, 19 Ky. (3 T. B. Mon.) 166, 167.

A contract agreeing to pay "good, current money" means the coin of the Constitution, or foreign coin made current by act of Congress, unless there is evidence giving to those terms a local signification. Moore v. Morris, 20 Ill. (10 Peck) 255, 259.

As lawful currency or money.

Where a note provides that it shall be paid in current money, such phrase imports lawful currency. Coco v. Calliham, 21 La. Ann. 624, 626; Miller v. McKinney, 73 Tenn. (5 Lea) 93, 96.

"Current money" means money which passes from hand to hand and from person to person, and circulates through the community, and is generally received as money in common business transactions, and is the common medium in barter and trade. Stalworth v. Blum, 41 Ala. 319, 321.

"Current money," as used in a bond wherein it was required that payment should be made in current money, was synonymous with "lawful money." Wharton v. Morris (Pa.) 1 Dall. 125, 126, 1 L. Ed. 65.

Of state.

The term "good, current money of this state," in a note payable in good, current money of this state, means current coin of the United States, and does not mean Arkansas bank paper, for such bank paper is not money. Such a note is clearly an instrument for the payment of money, and the term is distinguishable from currency of this state and current bank paper of this state, and all such terms, which clearly mean bank notes. Wilburn v. Greer, 6 Ark. (2 Eng.) 255-258.

A note which provides that it shall be paid in the current money of the state of Alabama means that it shall be payable in gold or silver. Carter v. Penn, 4 Ala. 140, 141.

A note payable in the current money of Missouri should be construed to mean payable in gold or silver coin alone. Cockrill v. Kirkpatrick, 9 Mo. 697.

A bond conditioned for the payment of a sum in current money of Pennsylvania meant the paper money emitted under the authority of Congress. Wharton v. Morris (Pa.) 1 Dall. 125, 126, 1 L. Ed. 65.

CURRENT NOTES.

In mercantile phrase, a note not due is current, that is, it passes in the market, where the maker is known to be good. If the note is overdue, it is no longer current. Hinsdill v. Safford, 11 Vt. 309, 313.

"Current notes" means notes considered as cash. Pierson v. Wallace, 7 Ark. (2 Eng.) 282, 293.

"Current notes," as used in a bond for $150, to be paid in current notes of the Bank of the State of Arkansas, amounted, in plain and popular sense, to a promise to pay the sum specified in the notes of the state bank at their nominal value. Bizzell v. Brewer, 9 Ark. (4 Eng.) 58, 61.

A note payable in current notes of the state of North Carolina might mean either treasury notes of the state, or notes on the various banks of the state, and is not negotiable. Warren v. Brown, 64 N. C. 381, 382.

CURRENT PRICE.

"Current price" and "market value" are synonymous words. 3,109 Cases of Champagne (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 1168, 1171.

CURRENT RATE OF EXCHANGE.

The term "current rate of exchange" can have but one legal signification, and that an unambiguous one. The rate of exchange is the rate at which drafts are negotiated. It is the amount in dollars for which a draft for sterling will sell per pound. Blue Star S. S. Co. v. Keyser (U. S.) 81 Fed. 507, 511.

"Current rate of exchange," as used in a note payable with current rate of exchange, should be construed to destroy the negotiability of the note. John Church Co. v. Spurrier, 50 N. E. 93, 94, 20 Ind. App. 39.

CURRENT VALUE.

The current value of imported commodities is their common market price at the place of exportation, without any reference to what price the importer actually gave for them. Tappan v. United States (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 690, 692.

CURRENT WAGES.

Current wages are such compensation for personal services as are to be paid periodically or from time to time as the services are rendered, as where the services are to be paid for by the hour, day, week, month, or year. Sydnor v. City of Galveston (Tex.) 15 S. W. 202, 203, 4 Willson, Civ. Cas. Ct. App. § 59.

"Current," as used in Rev. St. art. 2335, exempting from execution or attachment current wages for personal services, means running, now passing, or present in its progress; and hence current wages are such as are to be paid periodically or from time to time as the services are rendered, as when the services are to be paid for by the hour, day, week, month, etc. The services rendered must be such as that the compensation therefor is measured by the time of the continuance of the services. Dempsey v. McKennell, 23 S. W. 525, 526, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 284. "Current wages," as used in Rev. St. art. 218, providing that current wages for personal services shall be exempt from execution and attachment, means compensation paid periodically, or from time to time as the services are rendered or the work is performed—progresses. First Nat. Bank v. Graham (Tex.) 22 S. W. 1101, 1102.

Attorney's fees.

An attorney's fees for legal services rendered or to be rendered in a single case, or in the transaction of a single matter, or in the transaction of any amount of legal business, where he has not been hired for his services by day, week, or month, to be paid at the expiration of the time for which he was hired, and not in proportion to the business done, are not current wages. First Nat. Bank v. Graham (Tex.) 22 S. W. 1101, 1102.

Past-due wages.

The Constitution and laws of Texas exempting from garnishment current wages for personal services should be construed to include the money earned by a physician employed by a city to attend smallpox patients at a certain amount per day, which was not payable until his services were completed, though the money was left in the city treasury. Sydnor v. City of Galveston (Tex.) 15 S. W. 202, 203.

"Current wages," as used in Const. art. 16, § 28, and Rev. St. art. 218, providing that no current wages for personal services shall be subject to garnishment, means, where the wages are payable monthly, the wages for the month current at the time of the service of the writ of garnishment, and the exemption ceases to apply when the wages become past due. Bell v. Indian Live Stock Co. (Tex.) 11 S. W. 344, 346, 3 L. R. A. 642.

Current wages, within the meaning of Const. art. 16, § 28, and Rev. St. 1895, art. 252, providing that no current wages for personal services shall ever be subject to garnishment, do not include past-due wages voluntarily left by an employé in the hands of the employer. Davidson v. F. H. Logeman Chair Co. (Tex.) 41 S. W. 824.

CURRENT YEAR.

"Current year," relating to a lease, refers to the time of entry, unless the party stipulates to the contrary. Doe v. Dobell, 1 Adol. & E. 806, 808.

Under a statutory limitation on the power of the county board to contract for bridge building, to cost a sum not greater than the amount of money on hand in the county bridge fund, derived from a levy of previous years and two-thirds of the levy of the current year. It is held that the terms "previous year" and "current year" do not refer to the previous calendar year or current calendar year, but refer to the year from one levy to another. Clark v. Lancaster County (Neb.) 96 N. W. 593, 598.

CURSE.

A complaint for divorce, alleging that defendant cursed and abused plaintiff, "cursed" is susceptible of but one meaning. It was intended to convey hate and detestation, and indicative of harm or injury. Its synonyms are "malediction," "Imprecation," "ex-ecration," and constitutes cruelty and inhumanity. Irwin v. Irwin, 37 Pac. 548, 550, 2 Okl. 180.

Evidence that a person accused of cursing used the word "damn" or something to that effect, is insufficient to support a conviction. Carr v. City of Conyers, 10 S. E. 630, 631, 84 Ga. 287, 20 Am. St. Rep. 357.

CURSORY EXAMINATION.

A cursory examination is an examination of not a very minute character—an inspection of defects visible or discernible by ordinary examination. Anderson v. Erie R. Co., 54 Atl. 830, 831, 68 N. J. Law, 647 (citing Eaton v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co., 163 N. Y. 391, 57 N. E. 609, 79 Am. St. Rep. 600; Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Mackey, 157 U. S. 72, 15 Sup. Ct. 491, 39 L. Ed. 624).

"Tenancy by curtesy" is defined by Littleton as "where a man taketh a wife seised in fee-simple or in fee-tail general or seised as heir in tail especial and hath issue by the same wife, male or female born alive, albeit the issue after death or liveth, yet if the wife dies the husband shall hold the land during his life." And Justice Kent, in his Commentaries, vol. 4, p. 27, says: "Tenancy by the curtesy is an estate for life created by the act of the law. When a man marries a woman seised at any time during the coverture of an estate of inheritance in severalty, in coparcenary, or in common, and hath issue by her born alive, which might by possibility inherit the same estate as heir to the wife, and the wife dies in the lifetime of the husband, he holds the land during his life by curtesy." Guion v. Anderson, 27 Tenn. (8 Humph.) 298, 302; Forbes v. Sweesy, 8 Neb. 520, 525, 1 N. W. 571, 573; Billings v. Baker (N. Y.) 28 Barb. 343, 345; Ferguson v. Tweedy (N. Y.) 56 Barb. 168, 173; Bottoms v. Corley, 52 Tenn. (5 Helsk.) 1, 8; Guion v. Anderson, 27 Tenn. (8 Humph.) 298, 302; Westcott v. Miller, 42 Wis. 454, 465; Hutchison v. Exton, 32 Atl. 682, 684, 53 N. J. Eq. (8 Dick.) 688; McDaniel v. Grace, 15 Ark. 465, 483; De Hart v. Dean (D. C.) 2 MacArthur, 60, 63; Withers v. Jenkins, 14

S. C. 597, 607; Moore v. Darby, 18 Atl. 768, 769, 6 Del. Ch. 193, 13 L. R. A. 346; Todd v. Oviatt, 20 Atl. 440, 58 Conn. 174, 7 L. R. A. 693; Templeton v. Twitty, 14 S. W. 435, 437, 88 Tenn. (4 Pickle) 595; Carrington v. Richardson, 79 Ala. 101, 104; Barr v. Gal-loway (U. S.) 2 Fed. Cas. 903, 905; McNeer v. McNeer, 32 N. E. 681, 682, 142 Ill. 388, 19 L. R. A. 256 (citing Cole v. Van Riper, 44 Ill. 58); McMasters v. Negley, 25 Atl. 641, 642, 152 Pa. 303. The husband's right to curtesy at the common law was contingent upon there being issue of the marriage born alive, capable of inheriting the mother's estate; and, as he has no estate by curtesy at the wife's death, unless such issue has been born, he could have had no interest prior to the birth of such issue. Turner v. Heinberg, 65 N. E. 294, 295, 30 Ind. App. 615.

A tenant by curtesy is one who, on the death of his wife seised of an estate of inheritance, after having by her issue born alive and capable of inheriting the estate, holds the lands and tenements owned by her during his life. The seisin must be during the coverture of the wife, and, by the English common law, must be seisin in fact—the wife must have actual possession of the inheritance. Redus v. Hayden, 43 Miss. 614, 633.

"Tenancy by the curtesy is an estate for life created by the act of the law. When a man marries a woman seised at any time during the coverture of an estate of inheritance in severalty, in coparcenary, or in common, and hath issue by her born alive, and which might by possibility inherit the same estate as heir to the wife, and the wife dies in the lifetime of the husband, he holds the land during his life by the curtesy of England; and it is immaterial whether the issue be living at the time of the seisin or the death of the wife, or whether it was born before or after the seisin." 4 Kent, Comm. (11th Ed.) 26. By another distinguished American author it is said: "It is immaterial whether the child is born before or after the wife acquires her estate, if, had it lived, it would have inherited that estate; and it matters not though it dies before she acquires the estate, so far as the husband's right to curtesy is concerned." 1 Washb. Real Prop. (4th Ed.) pp. 178, 179, § 45. In the celebrated case of Jackson v. Johnson (N. Y.) 5 Cow. 74, 102, 15 Am. Dec. 433, Chief Justice Savage says: "It is immaterial at what period during coverture the wife became seised—whether before issue or after; nor is it material whether the issue be living at the time of the seisin." Templeton v. Twitty, 14 S. W. 435, 438, 88 Tenn. (4 Pickle) 595.

"An estate by curtesy rests on the unity of existence produced by the conjugal relation. The personality of the wife is by marriage merged in that of the husband. She has no separate existence. She has lost her individuality by marriage, and the tenancy comes by mere operation of law on the death of the wife, the other requisites concurring." Bottoms v. Corley, 52 Tenn. (5 Heisk.) 1, 8.

One of the reasons for the introduction of this estate into the English system was that the husband, being the natural guardian of his child, was entitled to the profits of the land in order to maintain the child; but a more prominent and important idea of the system was the reason that then existed in England in regard to all estates in land under the feudal law, to wit, that the husband, having become dignified by having an interest in land, was bound to do homage to his superior lord, and, the interest being once vested in him, it was the policy of the feudal system not to suffer it to determine during the life of the husband, as otherwise the lord might lose that homage which was his due from the land. To this estate the husband never had any natural right. Sir J. Jekyl said that the estate had no moral foundation to support it; and Crabb, an English writer, says that the term "curtesy" is derived from "courtesie," (Latin, "curialitas") signifying urbanity or suavity, to denote that the custom sprung from favor to the husband, rather than from any right. Billings v. Baker (N. Y.) 28 Barb. 343, 345.

Curtesy is considered a continuance of the inheritance of the wife for the life of the husband, and is said to have had its origin in his obligation to support the children. The right of curtesy attaches to equitable as well as legal estates of inheritance. Templeton v. Twitty, 14 S. W. 435, 437, 88 Tenn. (4 Pickle) 595.

Lord Coke says: "Four things belong to an estate of tenancy by the curtesy, viz., marriage, seisin of the wife, issue, and death of the wife. But it is not necessary that these should concur together all at one time; and therefore if a man taketh a woman, seised of lands in fee, and is disseised, and then have issue, and the wife dies, he shall enter and hold by the curtesy. So if he hath issue which dieth before the descent." Jackson v. Johnson (N. Y.) 5 Cow. 74, 95, 15 Am. Dec. 433.

At common law, tenancy by the curtesy occurs where a man marries a woman who is seised at any time during coverture of an estate of inheritance, and has by her issue born alive, and which was capable of inheriting the same estate as her heir. The common law requires four things in order to create a tenancy by curtesy: (1) Marriage; (2) actual seisin of the wife; (3) issue; and (4) death of the wife. The right of tenancy by the curtesy was secured to the husband by the married woman's act of 1848, § 6, on the same terms as it existed at common law. Ryan v. Freeman, 36 Miss. 175, 176.

It is immaterial whether the issue be living at the time of the seisin or at the death of the wife, or whether it was born before or after the seisin. McDaniel v. Grace, 15 Ark. 465, 483; De Hart v. Dean (D. C.) 2 McArthur, 60, 63. If there was a child which by possibility might have inherited the land from the mother—a child to whom the land would have descended, had it survived the mother—that is all that is required as to issue, and the father takes an estate for life as tenant by the curtesy. Templeton v. Twitty, 14 S. W. 435, 437, 88 Tenn. (4 Pickle) 595.

In order that a man may become tenant by the curtesy, his wife must have been seised of the land in fee or in tail. This seisin means a seisin in deed, and not a seisin in law; and therefore a man shall not be tenant by the curtesy of a bare right, title, use, or of a reversion or remainder expectant upon an estate or freehold, unless the particular estate be determined or ended during the coverture. Stoddard v. Gibbs (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 126, 128; Ferguson v. Tweedy (N. Y.) 56 Barb. 168, 173; Orr v. Hollidays, 48 Ky. (9 B. Mon.) 59, 60.

Seisin in law of the wife is not sufficient to invest the husband with an estate as tenant by curtesy, but there must be seisin in fact. Carpenter v. Garrett, 75 Va. 129, 133.

Dower distinguished.

There is a radical difference between a right of dower and an estate by the curtesy. The latter takes effect as a freehold estate immediately on the death of the wife. On the other hand, dower is not in any sense an estate until assigned. This is the common-law rule, the widow not being vested with the title or possession. She has no legal seisin or right of entry until dower is assigned. Malone v. Conn, 23 S. W. 677, 678, 95 Ky. 93.

As a freehold estate.

As interest in land, see "Interest (In Property)."

An estate by the curtesy is a freehold estate, although, when the right of curtesy is in the separate real property of a married woman, it is not a vested estate until it becomes consummate. Hayden v. Peirce, 43 N. E. 119, 120, 185 Mass. 359.

Tenancy by the curtesy is a well-known species of freehold estate in lands, recognized in all the states having a common-law origin, unless changed by statute. It is a life estate in the surviving husband of a deceased wife. Carrington v. Richardson, 79 Ala. 101, 104.

CURTESY CONSUMMATE.

Curtesy consummate is the interest which a husband has in the estate of his wife after the birth of issue capable of inheriting and after her death, and is an estate held, not in right of the wife, but in the husband's own right. Churchill v. Hudson (U. S.) 34 Fed. 14, 15; Hughes v. Milligan, 22 Pac. 313, 314, 42 Kan. 396.

An estate by curtesy initiate became an estate by curtesy consummate upon the wife's death, and was a freehold estate for the term of the natural life of the husband. It was said to be in many respects but a continuation of the estate of the wife, though regarded more in the nature of an estate by descent than purchase. Turner v. Heinberg, 65 N. E. 294, 295, 30 Ind. App. 615 (citing Watson v. Watson, 13 Conn. 83).

CURTESY INITIATE.

Curtesy initiate is the interest which a husband has in his wife's estate after the birth of issue capable of inheriting, and before the death of the wife, and is an estate by the marital right held by the husband in right of his wife, and is essentially different from curtesy consummate. Churchill v. Hudson (U. S.) 34 Fed. 14, 15; Hughes v. Milligan, 22 Pac. 313, 314, 42 Kan. 396.

Curtesy initiate is the interest or estate which marriage, seisin, and issue give to a husband before the death of his wife. Such interest may be conveyed before the death of the wife. Wait v. Wait, 4 Barb. 192, 205 (citing Co. Litt. 30a).

Until the birth of issue a husband had no estate of curtesy that the law recognized, but upon birth of issue he began to have an interest in the land, and was called "tenant by the curtesy initiate," and such an estate is sufficient to recover upon in ejectment. Billings v. Baker (N. Y.) 28 Barb. 343, 367. And this estate by the curtesy initiate might be taken on execution for the husband's debts. Turner v. Heinberg, 65 N. E. 294, 295, 30 Ind. App. 615 (citing Roberts v. Whiting, 16 Mass. 186).

CURTILAGE.

"Curtilage originally signified the land with the castle and outhouses inclosed with high stone walls, where the old barons sometimes held their court in the open air, and has been corrupted into 'court yards.'" Coddington v. Hudson County Dry Dock & Wet Dock Co., 31 N. J. Law (2 Vroom) 477, 484.

Jacobs, in his Law Dictionary, says "curtilage" is a court yard, backside, or piece of ground lying near and belonging to a dwelling house, and, though it is said to be a yard or garden belonging to a house, it seems to differ from a garden. The definition given in Shep. Touch. p. 84, Cunningham's Law Dictionary, and Webster's, Johnson's, and Walker's Dictionaries, is substantially the same. Mr. Bouvier defines it to be a space of ground within a common inclosure belonging to a dwelling house. It is perhaps unfortunate that this term, which is found in the English statutes, and which is descriptive of the common arrangements of dwellings and yards surrounding them in England, should have been perpetuated in our statutes. It is not strictly applicable to the common disposition of inclosure and buildings constituting the homestead of the inhabitants of this country, and particularly of farmers. In England the dwellings and outhouses of all kinds are usually surrounded by a fence or stone wall inclosing a small piece of land embracing the yards and outbuildings near the house, constituting what is called the court. This wall is so constructed as to add merely to the security of the property within it, but, as such precautionary arrangements have not been considered necessary in this country, they have not been adopted. People v. Taylor, 2 Mich. 250, 251.

Mr. Burrill in his Law Dictionary says that curtilage is a yard, court yard, or piece of ground lying around or near to a dwelling house, included within the same fence. State v. Taylor, 45 Me. 322, 329.

Curtilage in law means a fence or inclosure of a small piece of land around a dwelling house, usually including the buildings occupied in connection with the house, which inclosure may consist wholly of a fence, or partly of a fence and partly of the exterior side of buildings so within the inclosure. Commonwealth v. Barney, 64 Mass. (10 Cush.) 480, 482; Commonwealth v. Intoxicating Liquors and Vessels, 3 N. E. 4, 5, 140 Mass. 287.

To include buildings within the curtilage, a fence is not necessary, if they are within a space no larger than that usually occupied for the purpose of the dwelling and outbuildings. It is a very common thing in the newer parts of the country, where, from the nature of the materials used, a large building is not readily made, to have two or more small buildings, with one or two rooms in each, instead of a large building divided into apartments. Pond v. People, 8 Mich. 150, 181.

"Curtilage" means the yard or court for the protection and security of the mansion house; an inclosure belonging to a dwelling house. When used in a penal statute without modification, it must be construed according to the strict signification of the term. State v. Shaw, 31 Me. 523, 525.

"Curtilage" includes the yard, garden, or field, which is near to and usually in connection with the dwelling. Where the facts were indeterminate, the court properly left to the jury, in a trial for arson, the question whether a barn burned was within the curtilage. Cook v. State, 83 Ala. 62, 64, 3 South. 849.

Where a deed conveyed a hotel and lands adjoining it, being two or three acres, more or less, it was held that the words "land adjoining" were not synonymous with "messuage" and "curtilage," and that if they were these latter terms were not broad enough to include a small island in the river back of the land on which the same stood. Miller v. Mann, 55 Vt. 475, 479.

Garden or land adjoining.

Curtilage is the court yard in the front or rear of a house, or at its side, or any piece of ground lying near, inclosed and used with the house, and necessary for the convenient occupation of the house. People v. Gedney (N. Y.) 10 Hun, 151, 154; Derrickson v. Edwards, 29 N. J. Law (5 Dutch.) 468, 474, 80 Am. Dec. 220; Washington v. State, 2 South. 356, 357, 82 Ala. 31; State v. Hecox, 83 Mo. 531, 536 (citing Burrill's Law Dict.; Webst. Dict.). It is parcel of the house, and passes with the grant of the same. Edwards v. Derrickson, 28 N. J. Law (4 Dutch.) 39, 72.

Curtilage is a piece of ground, either inclosed or not, that is commonly used with the dwelling house. State v. Twitty, 2 N. C. 102; Ivey v. State, 61 Ala. 58, 61.

The "curtilage" of a dwelling house is a space necessary and convenient, and habitually used for the family purpose, the carrying on of domestic employments. It includes the garden, if there be one, and need not be separated from other lands by fence. State v. Shaw, 31 Me. 523-527.

"Curtilage" is sometimes defined as a field next to and belonging to a messuage. Edwards v. Derrickson, 28 N. J. Law (4 Dutch.) 39, 45.

"Curtilage" is not synonymous with the term "lands adjoining" in a deed conveying certain land and the "lands adjoining." Miller v. Mann, 55 Vt. 475-478.

Land under tide water.

A division of land under the tide water is not a "lot" or "curtilage," within the meaning of those words as used in a mechanic's lien law. Coddington v. Hudson County Dry Dock & Wet Dock Co., 31 N. J. Law (2 Vroom) 477, 484.

Separate buildings.

The term, within the meaning of a statute making it unlawful to burn in the nighttime any barn, etc., within the curtilage of any dwelling house, was construed to include a barn standing 80 feet from the dwelling house, in a yard or lane in which there was a communication by a pair of bars. People v. Taylor, 2 Mich. 250, 251. And as used in a complaint and warrant for the search of premises for intoxicating liquors, describing the place to be searched as a certain building, the cellar under the same, and the out buildings within the "curtilage" thereof situate on a certain corner, it cannot be construed to include the basement of another building connected with the building described by a covered passageway, there being no common inclosure within which the buildings stood. Commonwealth v. Intoxicating Liquors, 3 N. E. 4, 5, 140 Mass. 287.

The term "curtilage" does not include a store at a distance of 20 feet from the dwelling house, but not connected with it by any fence or inclosure, and therefore the breaking into the store is not burglary. People v. Parker (N. Y.) 4 Johns. 424.

The curtilage includes a smokehouse, having the front and door thereof in the yard of the dwelling house, though part of the building is not in the yard, and therefore the breaking into such building, though it occurs in the part outside of the yard, constitutes burglary. Fisher v. State, 43 Ala. 17-20.

A barn, situated 15 rods from a dwelling house, with a public highway passing between them, and a yard between the barn and the highway, is not within the curtilage of such dwelling house. Curkendall v. People, 36 Mich. 309, 310.

A frame building situated and standing near to and in the same yard with a dwelling house, and used in connection with it, but not forming a part thereof, is within the curtilage of a dwelling. The curtilage of a dwelling includes all buildings in close proximity to the dwelling which are continually used for the carrying on of domestic employment, though neither the dwelling nor the building is inclosed. State v. Bugg, 72 Pac. 236, 66 Kan. 668.

CURVED LINE.

St. 1871, c. 343, § 11, authorized certain railroads entering the city of Worcester to unite in the location of a union passenger station, the tracks to extend by a curved line across a certain street. Held that, where the general course of the line prescribed by the jury commissioners for the crossing of the street was a curve, it was a "curved line," within the meaning of the statutes, though a short piece of it, taken by itself, was straight. City of Worcester v. Railroad Com'rs, 113 Mass. 161, 171.

CUSPIDOR.

The word "cuspidor" is derived from the Portuguese word "cuspo," to spit; "cuspidore," a spitter. The English cuspidor is a spittoon of peculiar form. The difference between a spittoon and a cuspidor is only the form. Ingersoll v. Turner (U. S.) 7 Fed. 859.

CUSTODIA LEGIS.

See "Custody of the Law."

The phrase "custodia legis" means in the custody of the law. Stockwell v. Robinson (Del.) 32 Atl. 528, 9 Houst. 313.

CUSTODY.

See "Proper Custody"; "Safe and Close Custody."

"Custody," within a bill of items rendered by an officer for a keeper of attached property and for custody of the same, is probably used to denote the responsibility which the officer is under when he puts a keeper over property. Cutter v. Howe, 122 Mass. 541, 543.

The term "custody of property," as contradistinguished from legal possession, means the charge to keep and care for the owner, subject to his order and direction, without any interest or right therein adverse to him, which every servant possesses with regard to the goods of his master confided to his mere care, which custody may be terminated and prolonged according to the will and pleasure of the master. People v. Burr (N. Y.) 41 How. Prac. 293, 296.

"Possession" and "custody" are not convertible terms. To constitute possession mere temporary custody is not sufficient; there must be combined with it the control, care, and management of the property, so that, under statute relating to theft, if the property be in the mere temporary custody of a servant or other person, the indictment need not allege the possession to be in such temporary custodian. Emmerson v. State, 25 S. W. 289, 290, 33 Tex. Cr. R. 89.

The words "confined," "imprisoned," "in custody," "confinement," "imprisonment," refer not only to the actual, corporeal and forcible detention of a person, but likewise to any and all coercive measures by threats, menaces, or the fear of injury, whereby one person exercises a control over the person of another and detains him within certain limits. Code Cr. Proc. Tex. 1895, art. 171.

As charge or control.

The words "charge" and "custody" are frequently used as synonymous. The lexicographers give them as synonyms. State v. Clark, 29 Atl. 934, 86 Me. 194.

A party who swears that a paper is neither in his possession nor his control certainly swears substantially that it is not in his custody. There can be no custody in the absence of both possession and control. Roe v. Irwin, 32 Ga. 39, 49.

Act 1867, § 2, requires that the jury wheel shall be in the custody of the jury commissioners. Held. that the word "custody" did not mean physical possession, but control; and hence the clerk's custody of a chest in a vault, in which the jury wheel was deposited, was custody of the wheel, within the statute. Rolland v. Commonwealth, 82 Pa. 306, 319, 22 Am. Rep. 758; Klemmer v. Mt. Penn Gravity R. Co., 30 Atl. 274, 278, 163 Pa. 521.

Act April 10, 1867, providing that the jury wheel shall remain in the "custody" of the jury commissioners, and the keys thereof in the custody of the sheriff, did not require the jury commissioners to carry it to their private residences; and when deposited in a vault attached to one of the public offices, under the immediate charge of a sworn officer, it was clearly in their custody, within the meaning of the law. Rolland v. Commonwealth, 82 Pa. 306, 320, 22 Am. Rep. 758.

The word "custody," in Act April 10, 1867, requiring the jury wheel to remain in the custody of the jury commissioners, does not necessarily imply a constant keeping under lock and key. Thus, in a case where the commission had no separate office, the keeping of such wheel in a corner of the county commissioners' safe, used for no other purpose, was held to be in the custody of one who was a clerk for both boards. Commonwealth v. Valsalka, 37 Atl. 405, 409, 181 Pa. 17.

Gantt's Dig. § 399, providing that an officer shall execute an order of attachment on personal property capable of manual delivery by taking it into his "custody and holding" subject to order of the court, means that the property shall be taken into the actual and real custody of the officer, and that he must obtain control over it, and take it out of the control and power of the debtor, and that the officer must continue in the actual possession of it himself or an agent appointed by him for that purpose, and that if it is necessary to remove the property it must be removed, and the debtor divested of his possession and control; and the fact that the removal of the property would be attended with some inconvenience is not an excuse for the failure to retain actual possession of it, and an ideal or constructive possession of the property is not sufficient to meet the requirements of the statute. Adler v. Roth (U. S.) 5 Fed. 895, 897.

Guardianship.

"Custody and tuition," as used in Laws 1893, c. 175, providing that on the death of one parent the surviving parent may by will dispose of the custody and tuition of an infant child, includes guardianship of the estate as well as of the person. In re Zwickert, 28 N. Y. Supp. 773, 774, 5 Misc. Rep. 272.

Imprisonment.

A sentence of a person convicted of a crime that he be in "custody" till the sentence imposed upon him be complied with means imprisonment until the defendant shall comply with the sentence or be discharged in due course of law, and not a mere keeping watch or care of him. Smith v. Commonwealth, 59 Pa. (9 P. F. Smith) 320, 321.

One who is in jail is in "custody," within the meaning of Act Dec. 17, 1838, punishing any one who, by force or menace, sets any one at liberty who is in lawful custody. Hillman v. State, 8 S. W. 834, 835, 50 Ark. 823.

Jail liberties.

In an action against a sheriff for permitting a debtor in his custody on execution to escape, it appearing that when the debtor was placed in the jail he received a key thereof from the sheriff, which key was retained by the debtor so long as he continued in the jail, the court said: "Custody implies physical force sufficient to restrain a prisoner from going at large. When that physical force is removed it is, in the eye of the law, an escape. No moral obligation can be received as a substitute for it. Although promises may be made and may be observed to remain in close jail, the moment compulsion and force are withdrawn there is no legal custody. The prisoner becomes a free agent, and there is no longer any imprisonment, and the precept of the sheriff is disobeyed." Wilkes v. Slaughter, 10 N. C. 211, 216.

Where a prisoner is permitted to act not merely as a turnkey, but to have possession and custody and perform all the duties of the deputy or an assistant without any restraint whatever, he cannot be justly deemed in custody, and such proceedings constitute an escape as to him. Steere v. Field (U. S.) 22 Fed. Cas. 1210, 1221.

Release on bail.

A person arrested by law, and put in the custody of the law, remains in custody, either actually or potentially, until he is discharged according to law. Letting a person arrested for bastardy to bail, and allowing him a trial, without being in actual custody, was no waiver on the part of the relator in bastardy, and his voluntary absence cannot be allowed to impair her right or restrict the remedy. While he was on bail he was in the bail's custody, within the meaning of the law. Turner v. Wilson, 49 Ind. 581, 585.

Under the common law, right of bail has been construed to mean the custody of the bail; and where a person was in the custody of his bail he was in custody under an arrest, within the meaning of an act providing that where a defendant is in custody the plaintiff, without having a judgment against him, may file interrogatories to him. Levy v. Arnsthall (Va.) 10 Gratt. 641, 648.

"In custody," as used in a statute providing for a writ of habeas corpus for the purpose of procuring the discharge of persons unlawfully "in custody," etc., means in actual confinement or the present means of enforcing it; and a defendant in a criminal prosecution, who has given bail for his appearance at the next term of court, and is thereby entitled to his freedom, is not in custody, within the meaning of the statute. Spring v. Dahlman, 52 N. W. 567, 84 Neb. 692.

CUSTODY OF THE LAW.

"When property is lawfully taken by authority of legal process it is in the custody of the law, and not otherwise." Gilman v. Williams, 7 Wis. 329, 334, 76 Am. Dec. 219.

Property lawfully taken by virtue of legal process is in the "custody of the law," and property legally in the hands of a receiver cannot be levied on or interfered with by another officer of the law. Weaver v. Duncan (Tenn.) 56 S. W. 39, 41.

A thing is in custodia legis when it is shown that it has been and is subjected to the official custody of a judicial executive officer in pursuance of his execution of a legal writ. The officer holding such a thing cannot, after he has made his return of the writ, release it on his own motion to any one claiming title to the thing. Its status as to third parties is fixed by his return, and can be changed only by order of court. Money received by a trustee in bankruptcy from the sale of property which he has received in his official capacity under the orders of the bankruptcy court is in custodia legis. McFarland Carriage Co. v. Solanes (U. S.) 108 Fed. 532, 536.

The actual possession by an assignee under a general assignment for the benefit of creditors of the property of his assignor is not custodia legis. Rothschild v. Hasbrouck (U. S.) 65 Fed. 283, 285.

The phrase "in custodia legis" may be used to designate goods seized under attachment and in the possession of the sheriff. Stockwell v. Robinson (Del.) 32 Atl. 528, 9 Houst. 313.

Property in the hands of a receiver is property in the custody of the law. The receiver is but the agent through whom the court for greater facility acts. In re Receivership of New Iberia Cotton Mill Co., 33 South. 903, 904, 109 La. 875.

CUSTOM.

See "General Custom"; "Local Customs"; "Particular Customs"; "Usual Course and Custom."

In England and in the states of this Union which have no written constitution "custom" is the supreme law, always deemed to have had its origin in an act of a state legislature of competent power to make it valid and binding, or an act of parliament which, representing all inhabitants of the kingdom, acts with the consent of all, exercises the power of all, and its acts become binding by the authority of all. United States v. Arredondo, 31 U. S. (6 Pet.) 691, 715, 8 L. Ed. 547.

"Consuetudo, says Sir Edward Coke, is one of the main triangles of the laws of England, these laws being divided into common law, statute law, and particular customs; for if it be the general custom of a realm it is part of the common law. Co. Litt. 113-115. A custom used upon a certain reasonable cause depriveth the common law. Id. p. 112, § 169. A custom so long persisted in as to be known and practiced by the community is the law of the particular business in which it exists. Such a custom is supposed to be in the view of the parties when they contracted about its subject-matter." Adams v. Pittsburgh Ins. Co., 95 Pa. 348, 355, 40 Am. Rep. 662.

"Custom is unwritten law established by common consent and uniform practice from time immemorial." Lindsay v. Cusimano (U. S.) 12 Fed. 504, 507; Albright v. Cortright, 45 Atl. 634, 635, 64 N. J. Law, 330, 48 L. R. A. 616, 81 Am. St. Rep. 504.

A custom is something which, by its universality and antiquity, acquired the force and effect of law in the particular place or country in respect to the subject-matter to which it relates. Milroy v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 67 N. W. 276, 278, 98 Iowa, 188 (citing Wilcox v. Wood [N. Y.] 9 Wend. 346, 349). And is ordinarily taken notice of without proof. Morning Star v. Cunningham, 11 N. E. 593, 595, 110 Ind. 328, 59 Am. Rep. 211; Hopper v. Sage, 47 N. Y. Super. Ct. 77, 79; Lane v. Union Nat Bank of Massillon, 29 N. E. 613, 615, 3 Ind. App. 299.

"Custom is the law or rule which is not written, and which men have used for a long time, supporting themselves by it in the things and reasons with respect to which they have exercised it. On that definition are founded three axioms: (1) That custom is introduced by the people, under which name we understand the action or assemblage of persons of all descriptions of that country where they are collected. (2) That it derives its authority from express or tacit consent of the King. (3) That, once introduced, it has the force of law. To establish a custom the whole or greater part of the people ought to concur in it. Customs are general or particular. The latter respects a specific thing, a particular person or place, or with respect to the whole of certain persons or places: general with respect to specific acts of all the inhabitants of the kingdom, and may destroy the law, but a particular custom in any province or seignory has only this effect in that district or part where it hath been exercised." Strother v. Lucas, 37 U. S. (12 Pet.) 410, 445, 9 L. Ed. 1137.

Custom is that part of the unwritten law of the land established by long usage and consent of our ancestors, and may be further defined to be usage which has obtained the force of law, it thereby becoming the binding law generally or within a particular district or right of particular place as to the persons and things which it concerns. Minis v. Nelson (U. S.) 43 Fed. 777, 779; Somerby v. Tappan (Ohio) Wright, 570, 573.

"Customs, according to our law, result from a long series of actions, constantly repeated, which have by such repetition, and by continued acquiescence, acquired the force of a tacit and common consent. Code, art. 3." Broussard v. Bernard, 7 La. 211, 215.

"Custom is that length of usage which has become law. It is a usage which has acquired the force of law. Bouv. Law Dict. And ignorance the law will not excuse. A general custom is the law itself or a part of it. Thus, the allowance of days of grace on bills or notes is a custom of merchants, but it is established by usage so general, so long continued, and so pervading the whole commercial world that it is universally understood to enter into every bill or note of a mercantile character, and to form so complete a part of the contract that the bill or note does not become due in fact or in law on the day mentioned on its face, but on the last day of grace." Walls v. Bailey, 49 N. Y. 464, 471, 10 Am. Rep. 407.

"Customary law" is that which rests on no other foundation than usage, and hence it may be abrogated by usage. It derives its whole authority from the silent assent of those who are affected by it. Toler v. White (U. S.) 24 Fed. Cas. 3, 6.

"A legitimate custom has the force of law; derogates the former law that is contrary to it, and interprets the doubtful law; from whence it is said that there is a custom beyond the law, contrary to the law, and according to the law." 1 White, 360. "Custom is either general or special—general when it is observed throughout the whole kingdom; special when it is observed in some particular district. We must not confound custom with usage. Usage is no more than a fact; custom is a law. There may be usage without custom, but there can be no custom without usage to accompany or precede it. Usage consists in the repetition of acts, and custom arises out of this repetition. The usage leading to a custom may be proved by public writing, by the testimony of distinguished and ancient persons of the country, or by two concurring judgments upon the matter to which it relates." Escrive, Dicc. voc. "Costumbre." See, also, Recopilacion de Leyes de las Indias, lib. 2, tit. 1, law 4, in 2

White, 25. It will be seen that the requisites of a good local custom under the Spanish law are that it shall have been used by the greater part of the people for the space of at least 10 years; that it should have been approved or at least acquiesced in, by the public authorities; and that it should not be immoral or unreasonable. Cutter v. Waddingham, 22 Mo. 206, 284.

"Custom," says Escriche, "is the practice long used and received which has acquired the force of law. In order that custom may be legitimate, and not corrupt (corruptela), it is necessary that it should have been introduced with the tacit consent of the legislator, that it be conformable to the general welfare, and that it should have been observed for the space of 10 years. Legitimate custom acquires the force of law, not only when there is no law to the contrary, but also when its effect is to abrogate any former law which may be opposed to it, as well as to explain that which is doubtful. * * *

Hence it is said that there may be a custom without law, 'in opposition to law, and according to law.'" Escriche's Derecho Español, 23, 24. A custom, in order to be asserted, need not have prevailed for 20 years and be conformable to law. On the contrary, 10 years are sufficient to establish it; and, having prevailed for that length of time, and possessing the other necessary qualities, it acquires the force to abrogate the previously existing law. In a will contest evidence was admissible to prove a custom requiring only two attesting witnesses to a will. Panaud v. Jones, 1 Cal. 488, 498.

Any custom may be destroyed by evidence of its nonexistence in any part of the long period from the commencement of the reign of Richard I to the present time. 2 Bl. Comm. 31. This is sufficient to destroy all common-law customs in New Jersey, for the country was not discovered by civilized inhabitants, and civil rights could not consequently have been in use till more than three hundred years after the beginning of the reign of Richard I. Ackerman v. Shelp, 8 N. J. Law (3 Halst.) 125-130.

When a rule is clear and explicit, free from ambiguity and equivocation, evidence of custom and usage is inadmissible to vary or alter its terms. Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Graham, 94 Ala. 545, 10 South. 283. The true office of a custom and usage is to interpret the otherwise indeterminate intention of parties; to fix the meaning of words, expressions of doubtful or various senses. 2 Greenl. Ev. § 251. When it is said that custom and usage may be relied upon to excuse the violation of a rule (Andrews v. Birmingham Mineral R. Co., 99 Ala. 438, 12 South. 432), it is merely the enunciation of the same principle we have already declared, that a principal may knowingly acquiesce in or assent to a continuous disregard of rules established and promulgated, and for such a length of time as to justify those for whom they were intended to consider that the principal has abandoned them, and that they have ceased to be binding. To justify this conclusion, it must satisfactorily appear that notice or knowledge of such disregard by the persons for whom they were intended has been brought home to the principal or to some one whose duty it is to take action, and is authorized to bind the principal. Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Roach, 110 Ala. 266, 272, 20 South. 132-134.

As course of business or habit.

The word "custom" is used interchangeably with "usage" and "course of trade." Richmond v. Union Steamboat Co., 87 N. Y. 240, 249.

A finding of the court in an action on a policy of insurance on a vessel that "custom and usage" of the steamship company with reference to the voyages of their steamships between San Francisco and Hong Kong, with cargo laden for Hong Kong or Batavia, was for the vessel to carry the same to Hong Kong without transshipping it at Yokohama, at which port they touched, indicated a course of business pursued by the owners of the ship for a series of years, and establishing a state of things referred to in the policy of insurance as existing at the time it was signed and delivered, which signified a course of business of a particular line of steamships with reference to which the contract was made. Schroeder v. Schwelzer Lloyd Transport Versicherungs Gesellschaft, 60 Cal. 467, 480, 44 Am. Rep. 61.

A finding that after the original building of said ditch the waters thereof were granted by the custom of the settlers and original appropriators to all new settlers, etc., "was intended as a finding of fact that a habit had grown up that all persons making settlements on lands that could be irrigated by the waters of this ditch were allowed to use it, and thus any new settler would not be compelled to get an express grant in his favor, but could assume that, although this habit would not give him title, yet it could be shown as evidence of the consent of the settlers to the use of the ditch and water by the new settlers." Lehi Irr. Co. v. Moyle, 9 Pac. 867, 871, 4 Utah, 327.

Immemorial, universal usage.

A custom is something which has the force and effect of law, and is law by the authority and consent of the people; but it must be uniform and universal within the sphere of its action, and so ancient that the memory of man runneth not to the contrary. Hursh v. North, 40 Pa. (4 Wright) 241, 243 (quoting 1 Bl. Comm. 68, 74). See, also, Stimmel v. Brown (Del.) 30 Atl. 996-997, 7 Houst. 219.

Before custom or usage can have the force of law it must be shown to exist by proof that the custom is certain, reasonable, and to have existed from time immemorial; and if any one can show its beginning, or that there has been an interruption, it is not a good custom. Minis v. Nelson (U. S.) 43 Fed. 777, 779; Somerby v. Tappan (Ohio) Wright, 570, 573.

It is not essential that usage should be so ancient that the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, nor that it should contain all the other elements of a common-law custom as defined in the books. Lane v. Union Nat. Bank, 29 N. E. 613, 615, 3 Ind. App. 299; Morningstar v. Cunningham, 11 N. E. 593, 595, 110 Ind. 328, 59 Am. Rep. 211.

With reference to trade, a custom is a practice which is universal, or almost universal, in the trade in question. Smith v. Sixty Thousand Feet of Yellow Pine Lumber, 2 Fed. 396, 399.

As local custom.

Custom is local, and is alleged in no person, but laid within some manor or other place. Littlefield v. Maxwell, 31 Me. 134, 141, 1 Am. Rep. 653 (citing Co. Litt. 114a).

"Custom is a law established for long usage. A universal custom becomes common law. If the usage be confined to a particular place it is a custom. Customs are sometimes allowed to prevail contrary to the rules of common law, but in such cases are construed strictly." Wilcox v. Wood (N. Y.) 9 Wend. 346, 349.

Custom is unwritten law established by common consent and uniform practice from time immemorial, and is local, having respect to the inhabitants of a particular place or district. A right to take fish in certain waters claimed for the entire public is too comprehensive to be good by way of custom, as a custom so general would be indistinguishable from the law itself. So the question in such case really is not whether the usage is customary, but whether it is lawful. Albright v. Cortright, 45 Atl. 634, 635, 64 N. J. Law, 330, 48 L. R. A. 616, 81 Am. St. Rep. 504.

"A custom can only exist in favor of the community of a town, village, or hamlet, and cannot be claimed in favor of a whole nation, for then it becomes the common law. A custom relied on must be pleaded." Post v. Pearsall (N. Y.) 22 Wend. N. Y. 425, 441.

As part of contract.

A custom may be incorporated in a contract where it appears to have been the intention of the parties to contract with any reference thereto, and will be construed to become a part of it. Hopper v. Sage, 47 N. Y. Super. Ct. (15 Jones & S.) 77, 79.

A custom, in order to become part of a contract, must be so far established and so far known to the parties that it must be supposed that their contract was made in reference to it. For this purpose the custom must be established and not casual, uniform and not varying, general and not personal, and known to the parties. Sipperly v. Stewart (N. Y.) 50 Barb. 62. A custom is not established where the evidence shows that the custom was to pay from 15 to 20 cents a folio to stenographers for copies of minutes. Cavanagh v. O'Neill, 45 N. Y. Supp. 789, 20 Misc. Rep. 233.

"To render a custom valid and binding on a party to a transaction, it should include within it the proof or proofs to show it of such long continuance or general application as reasonably to warrant the conclusion that it was known to the party designed to be affected by it, or that he had actual knowledge or notice of its existence. A custom is the result of usage, and can only be properly shown by proof of the usage by which it may be claimed to be derived." Gallup v. Lederer (N. Y.) 1 Hun, 282, 286.

Custom or usage in law is something which exists in general repute. It is so prevalent that every one is supposed to know its existence, and is presumed to act and contract with reference to it. Duling v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co., 6 Atl. 592, 594, 66 Md. 120.

A custom must be shown to have been known to the parties when the contract was made, and to have been so generally known as to raise a presumption that the parties had it in mind at the time of the execution of the contract. In order that custom and usage may be operative in the interpretation of a general or ambiguous clause, it must be shown to be reasonable, uniform, well settled, not in opposition to fixed rules of law, and not in contradiction of the express terms of the contract, and of such a character as will be deemed to have entered into the contemplation of the parties. Robinson v. New York & T. S. S. Co., 71 N. Y. Supp. 424, 428, 63 App. Div. 211.

In its ordinary acceptance, "custom" is the frequent repetition of the same act, or way of acting common to many; ordinary manner, habitual practice; method of doing or living; and, in its legal acceptance, a long-established practice, considered as unwritten law, and resting for authority on long consent; usage. To establish the validity of a custom of trade, the usage must have existed such a length of time as to become generally known, and must be shown to be reasonable, uniform, certain, and not contrary to law. If, however, it is not directly known to the parties to the transaction, but is so general and well established as to raise a presumption of knowledge, it will nevertheless be binding upon them. Nelson v.

Southern Pac. Co., 49 Pac. 644, 645, 15 Utah, 325.

The office of a custom or usage in trade is to ascertain or explain the meaning and intention of the parties to a contract, whether written or in parol, which could not have been done without the aid of this extrinsic evidence. It does not go beyond this, and is used as a mode of interpretation, on the theory that the parties knew of its existence, and contracted with reference to it. Barnard v. Kellogg, 77 U. S. (10 Wall.) 383, 388, 19 L. Ed. 987.

Usage distinguished.

See "Usage."

CUSTOM OF MERCHANTS.

The custom of merchants was the systems of rules relative to commercial paper, partnerships, and other mercantile matters arising from the usage of merchants. Chief Justice Hobart, in Van Hearsh v. Turner, Winch, 24, said "that the custom of merchants is a part of the common law of this kingdom, of which the judges ought to take notice, and if any doubt arises about the customs they may send for the merchants to know their customs." Adams v. Pittsburgh Ins. Co., 95 Pa. 348, 355, 40 Am. Rep. 662.

CUSTOMARY.

"Customary" means according to usage. Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 2802; Code Civ. Proc. Mont. 1895, § 3463, subd. 11; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 5129; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 2463.

Where plaintiffs offered to show that they had carried out their contract according to the "usual and customary" methods of the Philadelphia coal trade, the offer was not insufficient to admit evidence of such custom, because it did not propose to prove the usage "based on a custom," since the phrase "usual and customary" imports more than actual or exceptional causes, and indicates a fixed and established usage. Carter v. Philadelphia Coal Co., 77 Pa. (27 P. F. Smith) 286, 290.

The fact that the usual, customary, and ordinary method of handling a locomotive was being pursued at the time a fire was set by it does not necessarily show that the prudent and careful way was being pursued, especially if the wind was blowing hard at the time, and the land adjacent to the roadway was covered with very combustible material. It might well be contended that more than ordinary care and caution was required. Solum v. Great Northern Ry. Co., 65 N. W. 443, 444, 63 Minn. 233.

In charter party.

A charter party requiring the vessel to proceed with all convenient speed to Cardiff, and there load a full cargo in coals "in the customary manner," means a loading of according to the usage of the port, and in a reasonable time, without reference to unforeseen casualties. Adams v. Royal Mail Steam Packet Co., 5 C. B. 492, 494.

"Customary," when used in a charter of a ship which provided that the cargo was to be received and delivered as customary, refers rather to the mode of receiving and delivering the cargo than to the time of doing the same. Aalholm v. A Cargo of Iron Ore (U. S.) 23 Fed. 620, 622 (citing Tapscott v. Balfour, L. R. 8 C. P. 46, 53).

Charter party providing that the hirer should be allowed laydays as customary in loading, held that the words "customary in loading" did not mean such number of days as vessels had theretofore generally been detained to the port for loading, but such number as would be necessary under the custom of the port to secure a cargo; and that, therefore, where the vessel was obliged to wait her turn for several days before she could obtain a berth for loading, such delay was not to be imputed to the hirer; but that since the shipper, under the terms of the charter party, was bound to furnish a cargo, he was liable for any delay occasioned by a deficiency in the customary supply of merchandise which he wished to load as cargo at that port. Nichols v. Tremlett (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 205.

Under a charter fixing the rate of demurrage to be paid by the charterer at "customary" dollars per day, the rate recoverable for delay in New York is not governed by the rules of the maritime association of the port, in the absence of proof that the rate thereby fixed is the customary rate. Randolph v. Wiley (U. S.) 118 Fed. 77, 80.

CUSTOMARY DISCHARGE.

The meaning of these words "customary discharge" in a charter party is the usual dispatch of persons who are ready to receive a cargo. It enlarges the source of delay, and makes it include all those usages at the port of delivery which the charters cannot control, such as the working hours, the order in which vessels must come up to the wharf, the observance of holidays, the allowance of three days to obtain a berth providing one cannot be sooner obtained; but here their force stops. They cannot be held to include any delay which is purely voluntary on the part of the charterers, though such delay is customary in the fruit trade, in which the charterers were engaged. The phrase must be confined in its meaning to excuse the parties for want of opportunity by reason of the customs prevailing at the port. Linsay v. Cusimano (U. S.) 10 Fed. 302, 303.

CUSTOMARY DISPATCH.

See "Customary Quick Dispatch."

A charter party providing for the unloading of the cargo with "customary dispatch" means a berth where the vessel can unload as soon as she is ready to deliver cargo, and the usual dispatch of persons who are ready to receive cargo. Dayton v. Parke, 22 N. Y. Supp. 613, 614, 67 Hun, 137.

Where a ship is to be discharged with the "customary dispatch" of the port, the freighter is bound to use reasonable diligence at his port towards the unloading, according to the terms and meaning of the charter party. Williams v. Theobald (U. S.) 15 Fed. 465, 469.

As custom of port.

"Customary dispatch," as used in a charter party relative to the discharge of the vessel, enlarges the source of delay, and makes it include all those usages at the port of delivery which the charterers cannot control, such as the working hours, the order in which vessels must come to the wharf, observance of holidays; but cannot be held to include any delay truly voluntary on the part of the charterers, though such delay is customary in the particular trade. Lindsay v. Cusimano (U. S.) 10 Fed. 302, 303.

A charter party providing for a voyage from New York to Arica, Peru, with a privilege of a second port in Peru not north of Callao, charterers to be allowed "customary dispatch" for discharging the cargo after the captain reports the vessel in the berth ready to discharge the cargo, means the dispatch customary at the place of discharge, and means only the custom of the port itself to which the vessel goes; so that the vessel in going to a place which was never a port before, and had no customary dispatch, would take no benefit from that clause, because it would have no application and no meaning in reference to such places. The Spartan (U. S.) 25 Fed. 44, 48.

"Customary dispatch," as used in a charter party obligating the vessel to receive the cargo with "customary dispatch," does not mean the acceptance in that period of time which is found to be the average time taken to discharge all like cargoes in that port, but means dispatch in accordance with all known and well-established usages or customs of the port. Thus, where the custom established in a particular port, in a particular trade, was to allow the consignee three days in which to procure a berth, and allowing him to remove the vessel to a second place of discharge as to a part of the cargo, such custom was included in the terms "customary dispatch," and made a part of the charter party. Smith v. Sixty Thousand

Feet of Yellow Pine Lumber, 2 Fed. 396, 399.

"Customary dispatch" in discharging, in a charter party, means dispatching with speed, haste, expedition, due diligence, according to the lawful, reasonable, well-known customs of the port of discharge. It is the same as usual dispatch, not the same as quick dispatch, which latter has been held to exclude certain usages and customs. Lindsay v. Cusimano (U. S.) 12 Fed. 504, 507 (citing Davis v. Wallace [U. S.] 7 Fed. Cas. 182; Thacher v. Boston Gaslight Co. [U. S.] 23 Fed. Cas. 874, 875; Keen v. Audendried [U. S.] 14 Fed. Cas. 177).

"Customary dispatch," when used in a charter party of a vessel which is to load or discharge in a general port with customary dispatch, refers to the general customs of the port, and not to the special usage of the charterer in his business, or to his means of dispatching his ship. "Customary dispatch, strikes and accidents of the mine excepted, would permit the charterer of a ship where coal is the only export, and is always loaded from the mine, to load from his mine with all usual diligence, working the railroad to its full capacity." In re Eleven Hundred Tons of Coal (U. S.) 12 Fed. 185, 187.

CUSTOMARY INTERPRETATION OF LAWS.

Under Spanish jurisprudence the customary interpretation of laws is that given by judges consulting the spirit of the law jurisprudence, usages, and equity, and has a certain force and authority when two or more decisions, made by a superior tribunal on a similar subject-matter, are in conformity with each other. The authentic interpretation of laws, however, is that given by the legislator himself. Houston v. Robertson's Adm'r, 2 Tex. 1, 28 (citing Diccionario de Legislacion, p. 316).

CUSTOMARY PRACTICE.

"Customary practice" means the custom or usage of a particular business house, association, etc. Where, however, the rights of the parties were fixed by their contract and the rules and by-laws of the association, its customary practice in dealing with its members was immaterial. American Bldg. & Loan Ass'n v. Mordock, 58 N. W. 107, 108, 39 Neb. 413.

CUSTOMARY QUICK DISPATCH.

See "Customary Dispatch."

The word "customary," in a stipulation in a bill of lading that the cargo is to be discharged with as quick dispatch as customary, manifestly means with as quick dispatch as is customary at the port of delivery. Terjesen v. Carter (N. Y.) 9 Daly, 193, 194.

The meaning of the expression "customary quick dispatch," when used in a charter, is well settled. It is the usual quick dispatch of the port where delivery is to be made. As distinguished from the usual dispatch employed there it requires haste, the ordinary haste of quick dispatch. Customary quick dispatch gives the charter a lower rate than customary dispatch. Smith v. Harrison (U. S.) 50 Fed. 565, 566.

An agreement to discharge a cargo of 475,000 feet of lumber with "customary quick dispatch" is not complied with by taking 30 or 31 working days in such discharge, where such lumber had been loaded in 16 days, although some allowance was to be made for wet weather. Freeman v. Wellman (U. S.) 67 Fed. 796, 797.

An agreement that a cargo of sugar should be discharged with "customary quick dispatch" at the port of discharge requires the use of platform scales for weighing, and is not complied with by the use of the tedious method of weighing on "sticks." Harrison v. Smith (U. S.) 67 Fed. 354, 356, 14 C. C. A. 656.

CUSTOMER.

A customer is a person with whom a business house or a business man has regular or repeated dealings. The customer of a real estate broker is one for whom he has acted in the buying or selling of the real estate. Weinhouse v. Cronin, 36 Atl. 45, 68 Conn. 250.

"Customer," as used in instructions relating to the right of a customer of a partnership to notice of his dissolution, means one whose dealings with the partnership have been confined to the purchase of its goods. Askew v. Silman, 22 S. E. 573, 574, 95 Ga. 678.

CUSTOMS.

Impost distinguished, see "Imposts."

Cooley, Tax'n, p. 3, says that the word "customs" means a duty imposed on imports and exports, and has a narrower meaning than the word "duty," which ordinarily means an indirect tax imposed on the importation, exportation, or consumption of goods. Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co., 15 Sup. Ct. 912, 915, 158 U. S. 601, 39 L. Ed. 1108.

Customs are duties charged upon commodities on their being imported into or exported from a country. Marriott v. Brune, 50 U. S. (9 How.) 619, 632, 13 L. Ed. 282 (citing 1 McCul. Dict. p. 548).

CUSTOMHOUSE BROKER.

Every person, firm, or company whose occupation it is, as the agent of others, to arrange entries and other customhouse papers, or transact business at any port of entry relating to the importation or exportation of goods, wares, or merchandise, shall be regarded as a customhouse broker, within the meaning of the war revenue act of 1898. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2287.

CUSTOMHOUSE PERMIT.

The only customhouse permit known when the factors act of 1830 was passed, which provided that any factor or other agent intrusted with any bill of lading, customhouse permit, or warehouse keeper's receipt for the delivery of merchandise should be deemed the owner for the purchase and sale, etc., was that which was granted to a consignee when the goods mentioned in his invoice and bill of lading had been duly entered at the customhouse, and the duties thereon paid or secured to be paid; and the term in the act does not include the permit for the landing of goods on which the duties are not paid, to the end that they may be stored in a bonded warehouse, as authorized by the act of Congress passed August 6, 1846. Bonito v. Mosquera, 15 N. Y. Super. Ct. (2 Bosw.) 401, 440.

CUSTOMS OFFICER.

The expression "officer of the customs," as used in Collection Act March 1, 1799, c. 128, § 71 (1 Story's Laws, 633, 1 Stat. 678, c. 22), making it unlawful to impede any "officer of the customs" or their deputies, should be construed to include an inspector of the customs, who acts under the direction and superintendence of the collector of customs. He is an officer known to and recognized by law. His duties are in many instances prescribed, and the omission of those duties, and any fraudulent conduct in his office, will subject him to heavy forfeitures. United States v. Sears (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 1006, 1008.

CUT.

The copyright act of June 18, 1874, c. 301, 18 Stat. 78 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3411], declares that the words "print, cut, and engraving" shall be applied only to pictorial illustrations or works connected with the fine arts. Higgins v. Keuffel, 11 Sup. Ct. 731, 733, 140 U. S. 428, 35 L. Ed. 470; United States v. Marble (D. C.) 3 Mackey, 32, 49.

"Cut," as used in Gen. St. 1878, c. 1, § 82, prohibiting the use of any ballot containing a "cut or device" on its face or back, made to distinguish one ballot from another, cannot be construed to include stickers or pasters with the name of a candidate printed thereon, and pasted on the face of the ballot, over the printed name of an opponent. Quinn v. Markoe, 35 N. W. 263, 264, 37 Minn. 439.

Whether the word "cuts," in an action on a policy of insurance on steel plates and cuts of a publisher, includes brass plates cut with designs and letters, and used for making impressions on the covers of books, is a question for the jury, when there is evidence of a trade custom that the term "cuts" does not include such plates. Houghton v. Watertown Fire Ins. Co., 131 Mass. 300, 302.

CUT—CUTTING.

The word "cut" imports a wound made with an instrument having an edge. State v. Patza, 3 La. Ann. 512, 514; State v. Cody, 23 Pac. 891, 894, 18 Or. 506.

The word "cutting" is used to designate a wounding with an instrument having a sharp edge. State v. Cody, 23 Pac. 891, 894, 18 Or. 506.

The word "cut," when used in an indictment, is equivalent to the word "stab." Starks v. State, 66 Tenn. (7 Baxt.) 64, 69.

"Cutting," as used in an indictment charging a person with willfully cutting off the nose of another person, means severing by some sharp instrument, and the nature of the instrument is immaterial, so that such an indictment is satisfied by proof that the nose was bitten off. State v. Mairs, 1 N. J. Law (Coxe) 453.

Where, as in Gen. St. c. 29, art. 6, § 2 (Rev. St. c. 28, art. 28, § 2), the language used was, "cut, strike, or stab another with a knife, sword, or other deadly weapon," it was held that the words were not restricted to weapons or instruments made for the destruction of life or the infliction of injury, but embraced a chisel. Commonwealth v. Branham, 71 Ky. (8 Bush) 387.

In Philpot v. Commonwealth, 86 Ky. 595, 6 S. W. 455, it was held (speaking of the words "cut, strike, or stab"): "This language has reference to, first, to any instrument which is capable of being used for the purpose of cutting, thrusting, or stabbing a person, and which may be dangerous to his life if used by the assailant for that purpose; or, second, any instrument capable of being used for the purpose of striking a person, and which may be dangerous to his life if used by the assailant for that purpose." There is no doubt that a sledge hammer falls within the second clause. Morehead's Adm'r v. Bittner, 20 Ky. Law Rep. 1988, 1988, 50 S. W. 857, 859, 106 Ky. 523.

On line of railroad.

See "Railroad Cut."

A contract for grading and preparing for ties for the bed of a railroad provided that the contents of "cuttings on the line of the road" should be removed into the adjacent hollows to form embankments. Held, that the phrase "cuttings on the line of the road" meant those places along the line of the road which would be found too high for the grade, and which would have to be cut down. Grand Rapids & Bay City R. Co. v. Van Dusen, 29 Mich. 431, 436.

Of timber.

"Cutting timber," as used in Rev. St. § 2461 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1527], prohibiting the cutting of timber on the public domain with intent to use and employ it in a manner other than for the navy of the United States, includes boxing and chipping trees for the purpose of extracting gum and sap for the manufacture of turpentine. United States v. Leatherberry (U. S.) 27 Fed. 608.

CUT GLASS.

Cut glass is glass, the form of which or ornamentation of which is made by means of grinding upon wheels. Binns v. Lawrence, 53 U. S. (12 How.) 9, 17, 13 L. Ed. 871.

CUT OF THE MILL.

A contract for the sale of the "cut of the mill," the mill being a sawmill, means all merchantable lumber—everything the mill saws, with the exception of culls. Sloan v. Allegheny Co., 46 Atl. 1003, 1004, 91 Md. 501.

CUT OFF.

Rev. St. c. 34, provides the punishment for any one who shall purposely and unlawfully bite or cut off an ear. Held, that the phrase "cut off an ear" did not mean the entire severing of the ear from the head, but it is an offense, within the statute, if enough be bit or cut off to attract observation and to render the person less comely. State v. Girkin, 23 N. C. 121, 123.

Wharfs and docks were not cut off from bays and inlets, within an act providing that, if the building of a railroad shall cut off any wharf or dock, the railroad shall extend the same, where the railroad constructed its road across a deep bay about 1,900 feet from the wharfs, placing a sufficient draw in the structure. But wharfs not within the bays or inlets were cut off where the railroad passed between them and the channel, where drawbridges were not erected. Tillotson v. Hudson R. R. Co., 9 N. Y. (5 Seld.) 575, 581, 15 Barb. 406, 410.

On railroad.

The term "cut off" is a railroad term defined to designate a shorter and straighter road, by which the length of a course or passage is reduced. Erie R. Co. v. Steward, 70 N. Y. Supp. 698, 701, 61 App. Div. 480.

CUT OUT.

"Cut out," as used in reference to the practice of cattlemen on ranches to round up the cattle each spring and cut out the cattle of the several ranches and owners, means separated. Hebbard v. Southwestern Land & Cattle Co., 36 Atl. 122, 126, 55 N. J. Eq. 18.

CUTLERY.

"Cutlery" is defined as including all tools made of steel, such as knives, forks, scissors, razors, shears, etc. In common parlance, there are different kinds of cutlery—such as table and pocket cutlery—but the word "cutlery" is evidently a generic term, which is often used to describe razors, shears, etc., as well as knives for table, pocket, and other uses. As used in the tariff act of 1883, fixing a duty on cutlery, it includes sheep shears. Simmons Hardware Co. v. Lancaster (U. S.) 31 Fed. 445.

CWT.

"Cwt." means the twentieth part of a ton, and has also a common meaning as designating, not the twentieth part of a ton, but 112 pounds. Helm v. Bryant, 50 Ky. (11 B. Mon.) 64, 65.

CYCLONE.

A cyclone is a rotary storm or whirlwind, of extended circuit, and it was held, in an action on a tornado policy, that an allegation that loss was caused by a cyclone or hurricane was admitted by an answer alleging that it was caused by a high wind blowing a steamboat against the property. Queen Ins. Co. of Liverpool v. Hudnut Co., 35 N. E. 397, 398, 8 Ind. App. 22.

CYCLOPS.

"Cyclops" is a word in which the right of exclusive user for trade purposes may be created. Hainque v. Cyclops Ironworks, 68 Pac. 1014, 136 Cal. 351.

CY PRES.

The definition of "cy pres" is "as near to." Imp. Dict. This authority also defines the term as follows: "When there is an excess in an appointment under a power executed by will, affecting real estate, the court will carry the power as near to (cy pres) the testator's intention as practicable, and prevent such excess disappointing the general design. The doctrine is not applicable to personalty, but is confined to wills. In regard to charitable legacies, where a literal execution becomes inexpedient or impracticable, the court will execute it as nearly as it can according to the original purpose, or, as the technical expression is, 'cy pres.'" Allen v. Stevens, 33 App. Div. 485, 497, 54 N. Y. Supp. 8, 16.

The meaning of the doctrine of cy pres, as received by us, is only when a definite function or duty is to be performed, and it cannot be done in exact conformity with the scheme of the person or persons who have provided for it. It must be performed with as close an approximation to that scheme as reasonably practicable, and so, of course, it must be enforced. It is the doctrine of approximation, and it is not at all confined to the administration of charities, but is equally applicable to all devises and contracts wherein the future is provided for, and it is an essential element of equity jurisprudence. City of Philadelphia v. Girard's Heirs, 45 Pa. (9 Wright) 9, 28, 84 Am. Dec. 470.

"The cy pres power which constitutes the peculiar feature of the English system of charitable trusts, and is exerted in determining gifts to charity where the donor has failed to define them, and in framing schemes of approximation near to or remote from the donor's true design, is unsuited to our institutions, and has no existence in the jurisprudence of this state." Grimes' Ex'rs v. Harmon, 35 Ind. 198, 252, 9 Am. Rep. 690.

The doctrine of cy pres is a doctrine of prerogative, and is that, where the specified object of a charity cannot be accomplished, the funds may be applied to other charitable purposes, or that the chancellor may seize them as a waif and apply them according to the King's conscience. White v. Fisk, 22 Conn. 31, 54.

The cy pres doctrine is the doctrine that if, in the administration of trusts, the original purpose of a public charity fail, and there are no objects to which, under the specific terms of the trust, the funds can be applied, the court may determine whether, in the event that has happened, it was not the probable intention of the donor that his gift should be applied to some kindred charity, as nearly like the original purpose as possible. The doctrine, in its last analysis, is found to be a simple rule of judicial construction, designed to aid the court to ascertain and carry out, as nearly as may be, the true intention of the donor. Doyle v. Whalen, 32 Atl. 1022, 1026, 87 Me. 414, 31 L. R. A. 118.

Where the scheme of a charity was wanting in sufficient definiteness of details to admit of its practical administration, a court of equity would order a reference to a master in chancery to devise a scheme for its administration which should, as nearly as possible, conform to the conditions of the founder of the charity, and thus was called into operation what was called the "cy pres doctrine." Allen v. Stevens, 49 N. Y. Supp. 431, 434, 22 Misc. Rep. 158.

The cy pres doctrine is a rule of construction in equity, whereby the intention of the parties is carried out as nearly as may be in cases where it is possible to give the instrument its material effect, as where the testator attempts to create a perpetuity. In such a case the court will endeavor to explain the instrument in such a way as to carry out the testator's intention as far as the rule against perpetuities will permit. Where a testator has two objects, one primary or general, and the other secondary or particular, which objects are incompatible, the particular must be sacrificed in order that effect may be given to the general object as near as may be to the testator's intention according to law. But the doctrine cannot be resorted to for the purpose of modifying and restraining an intention itself, as, where a testator's will shows a manifest intention to vest trustees with discretion to devote a fund either to a charitable or non-charitable use, the doctrine of cy pres could not be invoked so as to render the will not void for uncertainty. Taylor v. Keep, 2 Ill. App. (2 Bradw.) 368, 383.

The rule of cy pres, though ancient, is by no means obsolete, and has been stated as follows in Jackson v. Brown (N. Y.) 13 Wend. 437, 445: "Where the disposition made by a testator of his property is contrary to the rules of law as to the estates granted by him, courts, for the purpose of carrying into effect the general intent of the testator so far as possible (cy pres), adopted that construction of the devise which will most nearly conform to the general intent of the testator, though in part it defeats his particular intent." In re Howland's Will, 74 N. Y. Supp. 950, 956, 37 Misc. Rep. 114.

The cy pres doctrine of the English chancery, which might be defined as the right of making an approximate or discretionary will for a testator where he has only declared some indefinite, illegal, or ineffectual charitable purpose, has been distinctly disavowed. Nevertheless in this country a charitable gift, definite both in its subject and purpose, and made to a definite trustee, who is to receive the fund and apply it in the manner specified, is to be maintained, although it would be void, by the general rules of law, because the particular objects of the gift, or persons to be benefited by it, are unascertained. Such a gift is capable of being enforced by a judicial sentence, and affords no rule for an exercise of the cy pres power, but further than this the American courts cannot go. Beekman v. Bonsor, 23 N. Y. 298, 308, 80 Am. Dec. 269.

In New York the cy pres doctrine is now a part of the statute law, by 1 Rev. St. 748, § 2, providing that in the construction of every instrument creating or conveying, or authorizing a creation or conveyance of, any estate or interest in lands, it shall be the duty of the courts of justice to carry into effect the intent of the parties, so far as such intent can be collected from the whole instrument, and is consistent with the rules of law. Coster v. Lorillard (N. Y.) 14 Wend. 265, 303.

CYROGRAPHUM.

"Cyrographum" means chirographum, or, in other words, any writing. One meaning is "a note of hand," and therefor, under the common-law rule that detinue will lie for any cyrographum, detinue will lie to recover a note of hand. Gibbs v. Usher (U. S.) 10 Fed. Cas. 303, 804.

D

The letters "D. C." in a bail bond cannot be construed to mean Dimmit county, as they are equally susceptible of meaning De Witt, Duvall, Donnelly, or any other county having the letter "D" for its initial. Vivian v. State, 18 Tex. App. 262, 264.

DAGGER.

A "bowie knife" or "dagger," as the terms are used in the Penal Code, means any knife intended to be worn on the person, which is capable of inflicting death, and not commonly known as a "pocketknife." Pen. Code Tex. 1895, art. 606.

DAILY.

The prima facie meaning of the word "daily" is "every day." The question here was as to whether the word as used in section 7 of the gaslight and coke and other gas companies acts amendment acts of 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 181), included Sunday. That section required a gas examiner to make daily at each testing place certain tests of the purity and power of the gas supplied. By section 3 of the South Metropolitan Gaslight & Coke Company's act of 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 130), "day" was defined to mean 24 hours, reckoned from 9 o'clock in the forenoon of one day to 9 o'clock in the forenoon of the next day. It was argued that, from the provisions of said section 7 of the amendment act, the 24 hours from midnight on Saturday to midnight on Sunday must be altogether excluded. The argument was that such was the practice down to the passing of the act of 1880, and that therefore that act must be construed as having been passed with reference to the prior act. But the court said that, if the argument was sound, the practice in this case was insufficient. London County Council v. South Metropolitan Gas Co., 88 Law T. (N. S.) 623, 626, affirmed 89 Law T. (N. S.) 618.

DAILY NEWSPAPER.

See, also, "Newspapers."

"Daily newspaper," as used in Gen. Laws 1889, c. 47, providing that the official paper designated by the common council of Duluth shall be a "daily newspaper," means a newspaper printed and published six days consecutively each week, though one of such days is Sunday; there being no publication on Monday. Tribune Pub. Co. v. City of Duluth, 47 N. W. 309, 45 Minn. 27.

"Daily newspapers," as used in Act April 1, 1872, providing that the resolution expressing the intention of the board of supervisors to cause certain work to be done shall be published for a period of ten days in two "daily newspapers," is to be understood in its popular sense; and, in this sense, it is clear that a paper which, according to its usual custom, is published every day, except one, is a daily paper. The term would not admit of a construction that a paper which is published every day except Sunday is not a daily paper. Richardson v. Tobin, 45 Cal. 30, 33.

A publication devoted to the courts, financial, real estate, building, and business interests, which is printed daily, except Sunday, has an actual subscription price, circulates generally among business and professional men, prints daily a list of real estate conveyances and mortgages, contains notices of sales under trust deeds, and commercial advertisements not confined to any particular trade, and has brief items of general news, is a daily newspaper, within the law governing the advertisement of sales under trust deeds. Kingman v. Waugh, 40 S. W. 884, 885, 139 Mo. 360 (citing Kellogg v. Carrico, 47 Mo. 157; Benkendorf v. Vincenz, 52 Mo. 441).

DAILY USE.

The phrase "often or daily use" of alcoholic stimulants means that the person charged to make such use thereof is an habitual user of such stimulants. Ætna Life Ins. Co. v. Davey, 8 Sup. Ct. 331, 332, 123 U. S. 739, 31 L. Ed. 315.

DAIRY PRODUCTS.

Authority given a corporation under its charter to buy and sell dairy products gives it no authority to sell oysters. Bowman Dairy Co. v. Mooney, 41 Mo. App. 665, 669.

DAM.

See "Milldam"; "Sluice Dam."

The common meaning of the word "dam" is the structure across the stream, including the abutment on the sides. Paris Mill Co. v. Paris Water Co. (Ky.) 71 S. W. 513, 514.

A dam is an instrument for turning water to the use of a mill, as a bulkhead is the means of drawing the water from the dam; but neither may in fact have been used for either purpose at all, or, if at all, in such a way as to change or affect the original rights of the riparian owners on either hand. Burnham v. Kempton, 44 N. H. 78, 89.

A dam is an obstruction to the natural flow of the water of a river. A structure of planks built in the bank of a river, and not erected across the channel of the river, is not a dam. People v. Gaige, 23 Mich. 93, 94.

"Dam," as used in Sp. Laws 1871, c. 303, authorizing the proprietors of a certain marsh to erect a dam and dikes at different points, is employed synonymously with "dikes." Commonwealth v. Tolman, 21 N. E. 377, 378, 149 Mass. 229, 3 L. R. A. 747, 14 Am. St. Rep. 414.

As the pond created.

The word "dam" is used in two different senses. It properly means a structure raised to obstruct the flow of water in a river, but by well-settled usage it is often applied to designate the pond of water created by its obstruction. The word is used in this conventional sense in some statutes, and it is evidently used in this sense in a statute giving power to raise the "dam and water-works" to a height mentioned. Colwell v. May's Landing Water Power Co., 19 N. J. Eq. (4 C. E. Green) 245, 248.

A dam is a bar built across a water course to confine and keep back flowing water, yet it is frequently used to designate the pond resulting from the dam. Thus the grant of a dam includes an easement in the pond. Natoma Water & Mining Co. v. Hancock, 101 Cal. 42, 81 Pac. 112, 114.

As real property.

See "Real Property."

DAM FLOWS.

In a conveyance of a water privilege, a grant of the land which a certain dam flows may reasonably be held to mean the land which the dam flows when used for the purpose for which it was erected and conveyed, and the extent of which is capable of being readily determined at any one time, rather than the small portion of land which happens to be flowed at the moment of the conveyance, when the dam is out of repair, and the flumes and waterways are open; depending as much on the condition of the stream as upon that of the dam, and the bounds of which can with difficulty be ascertained at any subsequent time. Morse v. Marshall, 95 Mass. (13 Allen) 288, 290.

"'Damages' have been defined as a sum of money adjudicated to be paid by one person to another as a compensation for a loss sustained by the latter in consequence of an injury committed by the former." City of Cincinnati v. Hafer, 30 N. E. 197, 198, 49 Ohio St. 60; Nesbitt v. Moore, 17 S. E. 798, 799, 39 S. C. 351.

Damage is defined to be "loss, injury, or deterioration caused by the negligence, design, or accident of one person to another, in respect of the latter's person or property." Black, Law Dict. The plural of the word "damage" signifies a compensation in money for a loss or damage. Wainscott v. Occidental Bldg. & Loan Ass'n, 98 Cal. 253, 255, 33 Pac. 88; Richardson v. Harrell, 36 S. W. 573, 574, 62 Ark. 469.

Jacks*, 43 Ark. 439, 449; Collins v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co., 56 Tenn. (9 Heisk.) 841, 850; Davidson-Benedict Co. v. Severson (Tenn.) 72 S. W. 967, 970.

Damages are based on the idea of a loss to be compensated—a damage to be made good. In general, damages are "that which is given or adjudged to repair a loss." Maryland Casualty Co. v. Hudgins (Tex.) 72 S. W. 1047, 1048.

"Damages" are indemnity or compensation in money which the law gives to an injured party for the breach of a contract or duty. Western Union Tel. Co. v. Cobbs, 1 S. W. 558, 559, 47 Ark. 344, 58 Am. Rep. 756.

Damages are compensation awarded by law for the injury sustained by the doing of a wrongful act. Crane v. Peer, 4 Atl. 72, 75, 43 N. J. Eq. (16 Stew.) 553; Pegram v. Stortz, 31 W. Va. 220, 234, 6 S. E. 485.

Damages are the pecuniary compensation for an injury recovered in an action at law. The rules which regulate the amount to be recovered vary according to the forms of action and the circumstances, but in every modification of them the principle of compensation is observed. Stallings v. Corbett (S. C.) 2 Speers, 613, 615, 42 Am. Dec. 388.

Damages are the compensation given by the jury for an injury or a wrong done the party before action brought. City of New York v. Lord (N. Y.) 17 Wend. 285, 293 (citing Co. Litt. 257); McCoy v. Lemon (S. C.) 11 Rich. Law, 165, 175, 70 Am. Dec. 246; City of New York v. Lord (N. Y.) 17 Wend. 285, 290. See, also, Thompson v. Morris Canal & Banking Co., 17 N. J. Law (2 Har.) 480, 482.

Damages have been defined to be the compensation which the law will award for an injury done. Scott v. Donald, 17 Sup. Ct. 265, 267, 165 U. S. 58, 41 L. Ed. 632.

Damages are compensation, recompense, or satisfaction in money. O'Connor v. Dils, 26 S. E. 354, 355, 43 W. Va. 54.

Damages are the pecuniary consequences which the law imposes for the breach of some duty or violation of some right. Deane v. Willamette Bridge Co., 29 Pac. 440, 442, 22 Or. 167, 15 L. R. A. 614.

Damages are given as compensation or satisfaction to the plaintiff for an injury actually sustained by him from the defendant. They shall be precisely commensurate with the injury—neither more nor less—and this whether it be to his person or to his estate. Spokane Truck & Dray Co. v. Hoefler, 25 Pac. 1072, 1073, 2 Wash. St. 45, 11 L. R. A. 689, 26 Am. St. Rep. 842.

"Damage" means every loss or diminution of what is a man's own, occasioned by the fault of another, whether it results directly to the thing owned, or is but an interference with the right which the owner has in the legal and proper use of his own. Gainesville, H. & W. Ry. Co. v. Hall, 14 S. W. 259, 78 Tex. 169, 9 L. R. A. 298, 22 Am. St. Rep. 42.

Damage is the substance and consummation of the injury, and from it alone springs the right of recovery, so that the locus of a tort must always be determined by the place where the injury and damage arose, rather than where the negligent act is committed. Rundell v. La Compagnie Generale Transatlantique (U. S.) 100 Fed. 655, 657, 40 C. C. A. 625, 49 L. R. A. 92.

Gen. St. c. 69, § 1, making towns liable for damages happening to any person, his team or carriage, traveling on a highway or bridge, by reason of any obstruction or defect, means a compensation, recompense, or satisfaction to a party for an injury actually received by him, and precisely commensurate with injury, whether it be to his person or estate. In our view, a fair and reasonable construction necessarily implies that the words "damage which shall happen to any person" include all injury to property as well as person. Woodman v. Town of Nottingham, 49 N. H. 387, 391, 6 Am. Rep. 526.

Every person who suffers detriment from the unlawful act or omission of another may recover from the person in fault a compensation therefor in money, which is called "damages." Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 2723; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 2286.

As actual loss.

The clause "damage in his property," as used in Rev. St. c. 25, § 89, giving a right of recovery to any person who may have suffered in his property through a defect in a highway, means some injury to an article by which its value is destroyed or diminished. "Damage" means actual loss. This is Webster's first definition of the word. Weeks v. Inhabitants of Town of Shirley, 33 Me. 271, 272.

The object of damages is to give compensation to the party injured for the actual loss sustained, and the measure of damages is the actual, and not the speculative, loss. Kountz v. Kirkpatrick, 72 Pa. (22 P. F. Smith) 376, 386, 13 Am. Rep. 687.

"Damage," as used in the statute providing that a person may impound any beast found in his inclosure doing damage, means doing actual and substantial damage—in other words, doing damage in fact. Dudley v. McKenzie, 54 Vt. 685, 687.

Costs synonymous.

The words "damages" and "costs," though technically not synonymous, may be construed as applicable to costs only, since costs in many cases are considered as damages; and, where necessary to support the proceedings, the court will consider them as such, especially unless the party making objection shows that in fact the word "damages" had reference to a recovery of damages distinct from costs. Smith v. Mumford (N. Y.) 9 Cow. 26, 29.

As used in Gen. St. c. 53, providing that on taking an appeal the appellant shall execute a bond conditioned that he shall prosecute the appeal with effect, and pay all damages and costs which may be awarded against him on such appeal, "appeal" is synonymous with "costs" because in the very nature of things the only damages that could be awarded against appellant on such appeal would be the taxable costs. Riley v. Mitchell, 35 N. W. 472, 38 Minn. 9.

Costs of suit included.

Bouvier says that in modern law the term "damages" is not used in a legal sense to include the costs of the suit, though it was formerly so used. Brock v. Bolton, 16 S. E. 370, 371, 37 S. C. 40.

"Damages," as used in 2 Rev. Laws 396, § 143, providing that no execution on any judgment to be given by virtue of the act shall be prevented or stayed by any certiorari or other writ in case the party in whose favor such judgment shall be given shall give such security as may be satisfactory to the court to restore the debt or damages for which such judgment shall be obtained, with interest and costs, in case such judgment is reversed, does not mean to make the obligor liable on his bond for the costs of the reversal in case the judgment be reversed. Damages and costs are distinct and separate parts of a judgment, and are so entered on the record, and a judgment may be reversed as to the latter and affirmed as to the former. "Debt or damages" are intended to embrace a recovery before the justice. Griffin v. Mortimer (N. Y.) 8 Wend. 538, 541.

As damages found by the court.

"Damage," as used in a statute requiring towns to pay for damages done by dogs, and authorizing the collection of damages therefor by such city or town from the owners of the dogs, or from the town in which such owner resides, though he is a nonresident, by the commencement of a suit, if necessary, means actual damages found by the court before which the suit is finally instituted, if such suit shall be brought. Town of Wilton v. Town of Weston, 48 Conn. 325, 334.

Debt.

Damages are no debt until they are liquidated. Day v. Bennett, 18 N. J. Law (3 Har.) 287, 288 (quoting Jeffery v. Wooley, 10 N. J. Law [5 Halst.] 123).

"Debt" does not mean damages, and an action to recover damages is not an action to recover a debt. Millington v. Texas & P. Ry. Co. (Tex.) 2 Willson, Civ. Cas. Ct. App. § 171.

Under a statute giving to a landlord or employer double the damages he may have sustained by reason of his renter or servant having been wrongfully enticed away, the word "damages" is not used to embrace "debts," in the ordinary sense of that word. The statute is not one for the collection of debts, but for securing to the landlord or employer double all the damages he may have sustained, which amount will not only reimburse him, but operate as a penalty on the person so enticing away the laborer or renter. Chrestman v. Russell, 18 South. 656, 73 Miss. 452.

Exemplary damages.

Damages are the indemnity recoverable by a person who has sustained an injury—the sum claimed as such indemnity by the plaintiff in his declaration; and the term includes not only compensatory, but also exemplary or punitive and vindictive and double or treble damages, so that as used in Const. art. 6, § 11, providing that justices shall have jurisdiction in cases of forcible entry and detainer, where the whole amount of damages does not exceed $200, the term "damages" includes the whole amount to be adjudged, and, where treble damages are authorized, the jurisdiction is to be determined, not by the amount of the damage, but by it as trebled. Hoban v. Ryan, 62 Pac. 296, 297, 130 Cal. 96.

Injury distinguished.

There is a material distinction between "damages" and "injury." Injury is the wrongful act or tort which causes loss or harm to another. Damages are allowed as an indemnity to the person who suffers loss or harm from the injury. The word "injury" denotes the illegal act. The term "damages" means the sum recoverable as amends for the wrong. The words are sometimes used as synonymous terms, but they are, in strictness, words of widely different meaning. There is more than a mere verbal difference in their meaning, if they describe essentially different things. This the law has always recognized, for it is often declared that no action will lie because the action is damnum absque injuria. City of North Vernon v. Voegler, 2 N. E. 821, 824, 103 Ind. 314.

A distinction must be made between the words "damnum" and "injuria." We commonly use the words "injury" and "damage" indiscriminately but in the rule that "ex damno absque injuria non oritur actio," these Latin words are distinct. "Damnum" means only harm, hurt, loss, damage, while "injuria" comes from "in," against, and "jus," right, and means something done against the right of the party, producing damage, and has no reference to the fact or amount of damages. Unless a right is violated, though there be damage, it is damnum absque injuria. West Virginia Transp. Co. v. Standard Oil Co., 40 S. E. 591, 592, 50 W. Va. 611, 56 L. R. A. 804, 88 Am. St. Rep. 895.

Injury synonymous.

The word "damages" in an act entitled "An act concerning damages sustained by agents, servants, and employes," is used in the sense of the injury for which compensation is sought, and hence is synonymous with the word "injuries," and thus sufficiently states the matter treated in the body of the act, and is not used in its technical sense, to express simply compensation for injuries received, or the amount which the injured party is entitled to recover. Colorado Milling & Elevator Co. v. Mitchell, 58 Pac. 28, 29, 26 Colo. 284.

Within Const. art. 6, § 7, par. 2, providing that justices of the peace shall have jurisdiction in cases of injuries or damages to personal property which do not exceed $100, the words "injuries or damages" were evidently intended to be synonymous, and, when applied to property, they mean some physical injury to the property itself—some trespass upon it by virtue of which its value has become diminished or destroyed—and in this sense conversion implies no such injury, and hence the justice court has no jurisdiction of the action of trover. Blocker v. Boswell, 34 S. E. 289, 290, 109 Ga. 230.

Comp. St. Neb. c. 72, art. 1, § 3, declares that every railroad company shall be liable for all damages inflicted on the person of a passenger while being transported over its road, except in cases where the injury arises from the criminal negligence of the person injured, or when the injury complained of shall be the violation of some express rule or regulation of said road, actually brought to his or her notice. Held, that the word "damages," as used in such section, was not used in its technical sense, but in the sense of "injury," and was intended to refer to legal damages sustained by any person on account of injuries inflicted on a passenger. Omaha & R. V. Ry. Co. v. Chollette, 59 N. W. 921, 924, 41 Neb. 578.

Const. art. 7, § 20, giving justices of the peace concurrent jurisdiction in all "matters of damages to personal property" when the amount in controversy does not exceed the sum of $100, means all injuries which one may sustain in respect to his ownership of personal property. Stanley v. Bracht, 42 Ark. 210, 214.

By the use of the word "damaged" in a complaint in an action of trespass, alleging that plaintiffs have been damaged by the entry and by other acts committed by defendants, is evidently meant "injured," which means, in law, the privation or violation of a right; something, in other words, for which an action will lie in behalf of the injured person; an actionable wrong. Hitch v. Edgecomb, County Com'rs, 44 S. E. 30, 132 N. C. 573.

Loss synonymous.

"A synonym of 'damage,' when applied to a person sustaining an injury, is 'loss.' Loss is the generic term. Damage is a species of loss. Loss signifies the act of losing, or the thing lost. 'Damage' (in French 'dommage'; Latin, damnum, from 'demo,' to take away) signifies the thing taken away—the lost thing which a party is entitled to have restored to him, so that he may be made whole again. When used to signify the money which a plaintiff ought to recover, 'damage' is never nor in any sense synonymous with, nor collateral to, the terms 'example,' 'fine,' 'penalty,' 'punishment,' 'revenge,' 'discipline,' or 'chastisement.' Loss or damage sustained—the thing taken away—may be supplied by compensation; but the loss, damage, or thing taken away cannot be supplied or restored by the vindictive punishment of him who has occasioned the loss or damage."

Fay v. Parker, 53 N. H. 342, 16 Am. Rep. 270.

The words "loss and damage," as used in a fire insurance policy—that in case of loss the amount of loss or damage shall be ascertained by arbitration—are synonymous. Chippewa Lumber Co. v. Phenix Ins. Co., 44 N. W. 1055, 1057, 80 Mich. 116.

As proximate consequences of injury.

All damages which may be recovered in an action at law must be such as are the proximate consequences of the injury complained of. Oldfather v. Zent, 41 N. E. 555, 14 Ind. App. 89.

The words "damages sustained," in an action to recover damages under the dram-shop act, should be construed with reference to their own legal signification; i. e., to mean such damages as in legal contemplation are to be regarded as the result of the wrongful act. Tetzner v. Naughton, 12 Ill. App. 148, 153 (citing Shugart v. Egan, 83 Ill. 56, 25 Am. Rep. 359).

The term "damages" has a definite legal signification, and does not include any premium, bonus, or sum which a person chooses to charge, or a party to pay. Damages, when given as the penalty against a party for the nonperformance of a contract, mean the necessary, natural, and proximate damages resulting from such nonperformance, and not some remote, accidental, or special injury to the party to whom the right of action accrues. Low v. Archer, 12 N. Y. 277, 282.

As a punishment.

Damages are designed not only as a satisfaction to the injured person, but likewise as a punishment for the guilty, to deter from any such proceeding in the future, and as a proof of the detestation of the jury to the act itself. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co. v. Prentice, 13 Sup. Ct. 261, 262, 147 U. S. 101, 37 L. Ed. 97.

Total loss included.

A bill of lading exempting the carrier from all damage that may occur to such goods, arising from leakage, decay, chafing, breakage, or any other cause, while in transit, held not to include a total loss or destruction of the goods by fire while in the warehouse of the company while at an intermediate station while on the line of transit. Menzell v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co. (U. S.) 17 Fed. Cas. 23, 24.

A contract for the sale of dressed granite, which provided that the purchaser should assume the risk of damage to cutting on said stone while being transported, meant "injuries to the smooth surface or the sharp edges of the cut granite in the course of transportation, and not to the loss by a peril of the sea of the granite, with its cutting uninjured."

Tillson v. United States, 9 Sup. Ct. 255, 256, 129 U. S. 101, 32 L. Ed. 636.

Unliquidated damages included.

The words "damages on assumption," in the act of Assembly requiring a defendant before a justice of the peace to set forth his demand, if any he has, whether founded upon bond, note, penal or single bill, writing obligatory, bank account, or damages on assumption must necessarily apply to cases of unliquidated damages arising from contract, because, if they were liquidated by the contract, they would be clearly embraced by the previous description of demands founded on writings obligatory, as distinguished from bonds and single bills. Shoup v. Shoup, 15 Pa. (8 Harris) 361, 362.

As unusual or extraordinary damage.

"Damage by fire, wind or water," as used in a stipulation in a lease by which the lessee agreed to take good care of the demised property, and return the same to the lessor in as good order as when taken—damage by fire, wind, or water excepted—means unusual or extraordinary damage. Waddell v. De Jet, 23 South. 437, 438, 76 Miss. 104.

As value of property.

"Damages," in the article relating to miscellaneous provisions applying to cities, towns, and villages, are defined to be the depreciation in the value of the property which may result from the construction and operation of the proposed railroad. Rev. St. Mo. 1899, § 6117.

For attachment.

The term "damages sustained by reason of the attachment," under a bond conditioned that, if the attachment be dissolved, plaintiff shall pay all costs, fees, and damages which defendant shall sustain by reason of the attachment, cannot be construed to include indirect or punitive damages. The phrase is limited to damages for pecuniary loss ordinarily and naturally resulting from the seizure of goods, such as loss of sales, interruption of business, and expenses necessarily incurred. Commonwealth v. Magnolia Villa Land & Imp. Co., 29 Atl. 793, 163 Pa. 99.

As used in Code Civ. Proc. § 640, providing that an undertaking shall be given in an attachment proceeding, by which the sureties obligate themselves, in case the defendant recovers judgment, or the warrant is vacated, to pay all "damages sustained by reason of the attachment," cannot be construed to mean counsel fees for the services of counsel rendered in the course of the litigation, and which were in no degree incurred by defendant in any proceedings taken for the purpose of vacating or setting aside the attachment. The resistance being wholly directed to defeating the action itself, by establishing the result that the plaintiff in the suit had no legal claim against the defendant, and the services of counsel, rendered and bestowed in the litigation, being for that end entirely, the fees for such counsel services cannot be said to have been incurred by way of damages occasioned by the issuing and service of the attachment, though the services resulted in vacating the attachment, since that did not result from any effort or attempt to set it aside, but because the action itself failed, by exonerating the defendant from liability. Northampton Nat. Bank v. Wylie, 4 N. Y. Supp. 907, 908, 52 Hun, 146.

For breach of contract.

Damages for breaches of contract are those which are incidental to, and directly caused by, the breach, and may reasonably be presumed to have entered into the contemplation of the parties. Dowd v. Krall, 65 N. Y. Supp. 797, 798, 32 Misc. Rep. 252.

Mere speculative profits, such as might be conjectured would be the probable result of an adventure, defeated by the breach of a contract, the gains from which are entirely conjectural, and with respect to which no means exist of ascertaining even approximately the probable results, cannot under any circumstances be brought within the range of recoverable damages. Masterson v. City of Brooklyn (N. Y.) 7 Hill, 61, 42 Am. Dec. 38. Profits that are speculative or conjectural are not generally regarded as elements in fixing damages, not because there is anything in their nature per se which demands their rejection, but because they cannot be estimated with reasonable certainty. Hodges v. Fries, 15 South. 682, 684, 34 Fla. 63.

Damages for breaches of contract are only those which are incidental to, and directly caused by, the breach, and may reasonably be presumed to have entered into the contemplation of the parties, and not speculative profits or incidental or consequential losses. So, where defendant contracted to transport certain oats to market by a certain time, and failed to transport them until a considerable time thereafter, and in the meantime the oats were damaged from heating, such damage was not the result of the breach of contract to transport, but of the neglect of the plaintiff, or the person who, as his agent, had charge of the oats, to properly care for them. Hamilton v. McPherson, 28 N. Y. 72, 76, 84 Am. Dec. 330.

The term "damages" is one of very broad meaning, but, when applied to contracts, it is limited to such as may be supposed to have entered into the contemplation of the parties, and flow naturally from the violation of the agreement, and are certain in their nature, having respect to the cause from which they proceed; and speculative profits and accidental and consequential losses are not recoverable. Dodds v. Hakes, 21 N. E. 398, 399, 114 N. Y. 260.

Although the general rule is that damages are the amount of the loss the creditor has sustained, or of the gain of which he has been deprived, by breach of the contract, yet there are cases in which damages may be assessed without calculating altogether on a pecuniary loss or the privation of pecuniary gain to the party. When the contract has for its object the gratification of some intellectual enjoyment, whether in religion, morality, or taste, or some convenience or other legal gratification, although these are not appreciated in money by the parties, yet damages are due for their breach. Lewis v. Holmes, 34 South. 66, 67, 109 La. 1030, 61 L. R. A. 274.

For breach of covenant.

Damages are the compensation given by law for the loss a man sustains by the breach of a covenant of warranty for land sold. The value of the land at the time of eviction is the measure of damages. Guerard's Ex'rs v. Rivers (S. C.) 1 Bay, 265, 266.

The rule of assessing damages for breach of covenant either of seisin, or for quiet enjoyment, or warranty of title, after an eviction by legal proceedings, is to allow, first, the amount of consideration paid for the land; secondly, interest thereon for so many years as plaintiff will be liable for the mesne profits; and, thirdly, the taxable costs paid in defending the suit which terminated in his eviction. Morris v. Rowan, 17 N. J. Law (2 Har.) 304, 309.

For debauching another's wife.

In an action of case for debauching plaintiff's wife, the parties entered into an agreement in writing submitting the question of damages to referees, and agreed that the court might enter judgment on the report. Held, that the submission was of the quantum of damages only, and that the term "damages" was not equivalent to "liability," so as to authorize a submission of the question of defendant's guilt or innocence, but the only question for submission was, "How much shall he be required to pay to the plaintiff?" Samson v. Young, 50 N. H. 62, 64.

For failure to repair fence.

Laws 1838, p. 253, providing that if any person liable to contribute to the erection or reparation of a division fence shall neglect or refuse to make and maintain his proportion of such fence, or shall permit the same to be out of repair, he shall not be allowed to have and maintain any action for damages incurred, means such damages as are brought upon the party by his own negligence, and it cannot be extended to damages sustained in any other way whatever. Deyo v. Stewart (N. Y.) 4 Denio, 101, 103.

For infringement of patent.

Profits, within the meaning of patent laws, are the net gains of the infringer from the use of the patented invention, while damages are the losses sustained by the owner in consequence of the infringement. La Baw v. Hawkins (U. S.) 14 Fed. Cas. 899.

"Profits" and "damages," as used in the patent act, making one who infringes on a patent liable to the owner of the patent for the profits and damages, are not convertible terms. Damages are to be awarded in addition to the profits. "Profits" doubtless referred to what the wrongdoer has gained by the unlawful use of the patented invention, and "damages" to what the complainant has lost. Goodyear Dental Vulcanite Co. v. Van Antwerp (U. S.) 10 Fed. Cas. 749, 750.

For injunction.

The word "damage," in an undertaking given on the granting of a preliminary injunction, includes necessary counsel fees paid to secure the enacting of the same (Edwards v. Bodine [N. Y.] 11 Paige, 223; Aldrich v. Reynolds [N. Y.] 1 Barb. Ch. 613; Andrews v. Glenville Woolen Co., 50 N. Y. 282; Hovey v. Rubber Tip Pencil Co., Id. 335; Disbrow v. Garcia, 52 N. Y. 654; Rose v. Post, 56 N. Y. 603, 604), and, as used in a receipt for a sum of money deposited with the officer in lieu of the bond of indemnity, and as security for damages, includes the payment of counsel fees. De Sisto v. Loewy, 53 N. Y. Supp. 807, 809, 24 Misc. Rep. 725.

"Damages," as used in a bond conditioned to pay to the party enjoined such damages as he might sustain by reason of the injunction, meant all damages which occurred to the plaintiff by reason of the injunction, and is clearly broad enough to embrace the counsel fees which the plaintiff had been obliged to pay out in defending the suit which the defendant brought against him; such damages legitimately arising from the defendant's bringing that suit and contesting the claim. Corcoran v. Judson, 24 N. Y. 106, 109.

"Damages," as the term is used in reference to damages resulting from an illegal injunction, means pecuniary loss arising from the restraint imposed by the injunction, not the expenditure in the defense of the suit; and therefore a bond conditioned to pay damages will not authorize a recovery of the attorney's fees expended in resisting the injunction. Barrett v. Bowers, 32 Atl. 871, 872, 87 Me. 185.

In an injunction bond, which followed the statutes, and was conditioned to pay "all such costs as may be awarded against the said plaintiff, and all such damages as shall be incurred, in case the said injunction be dissolved," the word "damages" was not intended to cover an allowance of counsel fees.

Wisecarver v. Wisecarver, 34 S. E. 56, 57, 97 Va. 452.

The word "damages" is the term commonly employed in all injunction bonds to express the obligation assumed by the sureties. It is well established that the loss of the use and rental of premises during the time defendant was enjoined is a proper element of damages to be recovered in an action on the bond. Thus, under a bond to pay all damages which plaintiff may incur by the vacation of a temporary injunction against floating logs down a stream, it embraces loss for tollage on the logs. De Camp v. Burns, 53 N. Y. Supp. 1035, 1037, 33 App. Div. 517.

For laying one railroad across another.

The term "damages," which, in the case of laying out one road over and across another, has been held not to include compensation for the interruption and inconvenience to the business of the latter occasioned thereby is still a much broader term than "costs." City of Newton v. Boston & A. R. Co., 51 N. E. 183, 185, 172 Mass. 5.

For personal injury.

Damages for a personal injury consist of three principal items: First, the expenses to which the injured person is subjected by reason of the injury complained of; second, the inconvenience and suffering naturally resulting from it; third, the loss of earning power, if any, and whether temporary or permanent, consequent upon the character of the injury. Goodhart v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 35 Atl. 191, 192, 177 Pa. 1, 55 Am. St. Rep. 705 (citing Owens v. People's Pass. Ry. Co., 155 Pa. 334, 26 Atl. 748).

Rev. St. § 2326, prohibiting the commencement of suit against municipal corporations for damages arising from any cause prior to the filing of a claim therefor with the clerk of the corporation, etc., does not include damages for personal injuries. City of Warren v. Davis, 3 N. E. 301, 43 Ohio St. 447.

For sale of liquor to minor.

A bond given by a person holding a liquor license, conditioned to pay all damages which shall be recovered from him under and pursuant to the provisions of St. 1875, c. 99, § 9, as required by such act, includes the forfeit of $100 authorized by section 15 for selling or giving intoxicating liquors to minors. Day v. Frank, 127 Mass. 497, 498.

For taking appeal or writ of error.

Judiciary Act 1789, c. 20, § 22, requires every judge or justice signing a citation on a writ of error to take security that the plaintiff in error shall prosecute his writ to effect, and "answer all damages and costs if he fails to make a good plea." Held, that the word "damages" is not used as descriptive of the nature of the claim upon which the original judgment is founded, but as descriptive of the indemnity which the defendant is entitled to if the judgment is affirmed. Whatever losses he may sustain by the judgment not being satisfied and paid after the affirmance, these are the damages which he has sustained, and for which the bond ought to give good and sufficient security. Catlett v. Brodie, 22 U. S. (9 Wheat.) 553, 554, 6 L. Ed. 158.

In Catlett v. Brodie, 22 U. S. (9 Wheat.) 553, 6 L. Ed. 158, it was held that the term "damages," as included in the bond to pay damages and costs that should be adjudged for the delay caused by the issuance of a writ of error, covered whatever losses the plaintiff might sustain by the judgment not being satisfied and paid after affirmance. Omaha Hotel Co. v. Kountze, 2 Sup. Ct. 911, 919, 107 U. S. 378, 27 L. Ed. 609.

United States Supreme Court rule 29 (3 Sup. Ct. xvi), requiring a supersedeas bond in the Circuit Court to be taken in an amount sufficient to secure the sum recovered for the use or detention of the property, and the costs of the suit, and just damages for delay, cannot be construed, in mortgage foreclosure proceedings, to include all the accumulation of interest on the mortgage indebtedness, and pending the appeal and supersedeas, but merely the accumulation of interest consequent on the appeal; nor can it include the loss of profits by the loss of the opportunity of bidding in the property at a reduced price and speculating on its rise. Jerome v. McCarter, 88 U. S. (21 Wall.) 17, 32, 22 L. Ed. 515.

An appeal bond given to secure any damages which might arise in consequence of the appeal includes interest at the rate fixed by the statute on the amount of the judgment from the date of its rendition to the time of entering the judgment above. Mason v. Smith, 79 Tenn. (11 Lea) 67, 72.

The word "damages," as used in the United States statutes relating to a supersedeas bond on writ of error and appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, should be construed to include not only those which may be awarded by the appellate court for the delay or prospective damages, but also those which the appellee may sustain by reason of not having his judgment paid or enforced. Ray v. Ray, 1 Idaho, 705, 708.

Rev. St. c. 104, requiring a lessee, on appealing from a judgment rendered by a justice of the peace, in the process given to a lessor by the statute, conditioned to pay the intervening rent and damages, would not include remuneration for loss sustained by reason of the appellees being prevented from making sale of the premises, and for injury to the same for the improper manner of occupation, but include nothing more than the rent at a stipulated rate, and interest thereon. Bartholomew v. Chapin, 51 Mass. (10 Metc.) 1, 8.

The appropriation by the mortgagor of the rents, issues, and profits of the mortgaged land during the pendency of a wrongful appeal by him from an order confirming the sale of the land under foreclosure was damage, within the meaning of the statute and the condition of a supersedeas bond. Woodworth v. Northwestern Mut. Life Ins. Co., 22 Sup. Ct. 676, 680, 185 U. S. 354, 46 L. Ed. 945.

For taking property.

Laws 1893, p. 62, provides for condemnation of property, and requires the value and damages allowed to each owner to be expressly stated in the findings of the commissioners. Held, that the word "damages" is used in the enlarged sense of covering all damages suffered by the landowner by reason of the condemnation, whether they result from the taking of the land, or from the damage to the remainder not condemned to public use. City of St. Joseph v. Crowther, 43 S. W. 786, 788, 142 Mo. 155.

The term "damages," in a grant of a right of way to a railroad company on payment of the damages, means all the damages resulting from the location and construction of the railroad through plaintiff's land; the measure being the difference in value of the entire property or tract as a whole, as it was before the railroad was laid upon it, and as it is affected by the railroad after it is finished and completed. Hoffman v. Bloomsburg & S. R. R. Co., 27 Atl. 564, 565, 157 Pa. 174.

The word "damages," as used in Code, § 1437, providing that a person applying for the establishment of a road shall, when the damages are assessed to the owner, etc., is used to indicate the compensation to be paid to the owner, and is equivalent to the words "just compensation," and hence will not be limited to the mere value of the land taken. Commissioners' Court of Colbert County v. Street, 22 South. 629, 632, 116 Ala. 28.

The word "damages," in relation to the right of a person to recover compensation and damages for property taken by eminent domain, is of general import, and equivalent to "compensation." It includes more than the mere value of the property taken, for often the main injury is not in the value of the property absolutely lost to the owner, but in the effect upon the balance of his property of the cutting out of the part taken. Bauman v. Ross, 17 Sup. Ct. 966, 979, 167 U. S. 548, 42 L. Ed. 270 (citing Pottawatomie County Comrs v. O'Sullivan, 17 Kan. 58, 60).

The word "damages," as used in the charter of a city providing that when the mayor and general council shall exercise their authority to open, lay out, etc., public streets, they shall appoint freeholders to assess the damages sustained, was not intended to embrace compensation for incidental injuries to realty, which it had been held could not be recovered, but is limited to damages which are incurred in the actual taking and appropriation of the property itself. Hurt v. City of Atlanta, 28 S. E. 65, 67, 100 Ga. 274.

The word "damages," as used in Lateral Railroad Act Feb. 17, 1871 (P. L. 1871, 56), is used as a relative and comparative term, and means damages or hurt which might happen or result to a landowner, over and above the advantages by possibility accruing to him. Hays v. Briggs (Pa.) 3 Pittsb. R. 504, 517.

Rev. St. 1894, § 5660 (Rev. St. 1881, § 4290), provides that damages on the laying out of the drains shall be assessed to the parties owning the lands benefited in proportion as each tract of land assessed is benefited. Held, that "damages" means the actual damage, if any, after deducting the benefits. Wilson v. Talley, 42 N. E. 1009, 1010, 144 Ind. 74.

Act Feb. 4, 1830, authorized the organization of a canal company, and provided that, in case the company could not agree with the owner for the purchase of lands over which the canal was to extend, commissioners should be appointed to assess and report the damages which should be paid for the land, and that, if either party was dissatisfied with the report of the commissioners, he should apply to the Supreme Court at the next term, and, on good cause shown, the report might be set aside, and the issue tried by a jury, who should assess the value of the land and the damages sustained. Held to include all damages accruing to the owner from any and every physical effect produced by the construction and use of the canal, whether the same could be clearly seen and easily estimated before the construction of the canal, or whether they were uncertain and doubtful results from such construction; and the owner is entitled to all damages sustained by him, or likely to be sustained, from such construction, whether they arise from the alteration or destruction of a public or private way, the exclusion or the overflowing of waters, the alteration or change in the current of streams, or the destruction of crops, the deterioration of the adjacent lands by leakage, or whatever other damages may result from the natural and physical effects produced by the canal, provided, always, that it shall be constructed in accordance with the provisions of the act, and with proper care and skill. Van Schoick v. Delaware & R. Canal Co., 20 N. J. Law (Spencer) 249, 254.

The phrase in the act relating to the exercise of eminent domain, "which may damage property not actually taken," relates to contiguous lands of the same owner, a part of which only are taken, so that where the party seeking condemnation has not embraced all the owner's contiguous lands not actually taken, but damaged, the owner may file a cross-petition, and have the damages to the other lands assessed. Stetson v. Chicago & E. R. Co., 75 Ill. 74, 77.

For taking trees from another's land.

"Damages," as used in 2 Rev. St. p. 328, § 1, providing that every person who shall cut down or carry off any trees on the land of another person without leave of the owner shall forfeit and pay to the owner of such land treble the amount of the damages which should be assessed therefor in an action of trespass, means the amount of damages sustained by the trespass, and does not mean the value of the wood taken. McCruden v. Rochester Ry. Co., 25 N. Y. Supp. 114, 118, 5 Misc. Rep. 59.

For wrongful death.

To constitute a right to recover damages, the party claiming damages must have sustained the loss. The party against whom they are claimed must be chargeable with the loss. Davidson-Benedict Co. v. Severson, 72 S. W. 967, 970, 109 Tenn. 572 (citing Collins v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co., 56 Tenn. [9 Heisk.] 841). In an action for wrongful death, if plaintiff has a reasonable expectation of pecuniary advantage from the continuance of the life of the deceased, her husband, she can recover for it; and, the greater the value of the life in a pecuniary sense, the more perfect the right of recovery. Collins v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co., 56 Tenn. (9 Heisk.) 841, 850.

"Damages," as used in Shannon's Code, § 4029, relating to actions for wrongful death, does not authorize recovery for mental or physical suffering caused to the widow by the wrongful killing of her husband. Knoxville, C., G. & L. R. Co. v. Wyrick, 42 S. W. 434, 436, 99 Tenn. 500.

DAMAGE EX CONTRACTU.

Mr. Justice Spofford, in Kohn v. Town of Carrollton, 10 La. Ann. 719, distinguishes between damages ex delicto and damages ex contractu by saying that "the former flow from the violation of a general duty; the latter, from the breach of a special obligation." State v. Fourchy, 31 South. 325, 331, 106 La. 743.

DAMAGE EX DELICTO.

Damage ex contractu distinguished, see "Damage Ex Contractu."

DAMAGE FOR PUBLIC USE.

Const. art. 2, § 21, providing that compensation shall be made to an owner for property taken or damaged, could not be construed to include in its meaning the burdening of a street with a new use, as by the construction and operation of a railroad at grade. Henry Gaus & Sons Mfg. Co. v. St. Louis, K. & N. W. Ry. Co., 20 S. W. 658, 113 Mo. 308, 18 L. R. A. 339, 35 Am. St. Rep. 706.

Const. 1875, § 21, providing that private property shall not be taken or "damaged for public use" without just compensation, applies to a damage by establishing a grade of a street, or by raising or lowering a grade previously established. McElroy v. Kansas City (U. S.) 21 Fed. 257, 260.

"Damaging," as used in a constitutional provision prohibiting the taking or damaging of private property for public use without compensation, does not include the legal vacation of city streets and alleys. City of East St. Louis v. O'Flynn, 10 N. E. 395, 119 Ill. 200, 59 Am. Rep. 795.

A regulation adopted for public safety under the police power of the state, as the requirement of a railroad company to plank a street crossing and erect gates and maintain a gateman at the crossing of a street over the tracks of the railroad company, is not a taking or damaging of private property without just compensation, although such regulation involves expense. Morris & E. R. Co. v. City of Orange, 43 Atl. 730, 732, 63 N. J. Law, 252.

In Ruckert v. Grand Ave. Ry. Co., 63 S. W. 814, 818, 163 Mo. 260, Rude v. City of St. Louis, 6 S. W. 257, 93 Mo. 408, construing the words "taken or damaged" in connection with a claim for damages by an abutting owner against a city, is cited with approval; it being held in the latter case that the abutting owner must show himself entitled to recover damages for an obstruction of the street, and that the damages are peculiar to him—different in kind, and not merely in degree, from those suffered by other members of the community. Hickman v. Kansas City, 25 S. W. 225, 120 Mo. 110, 23 L. R. A. 658, 41 Am. St. Rep. 684, was also cited in support of this doctrine. In that case the court says that section 21, art. 2, Const. 1875, which provides that private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation, has been amended by adding the words "or damaged" simply to provide for compensation when property is damaged as well as when it is taken for public use, and, since they were added, it has been the settled law that when property is damaged by establishing the grade of the street, or by raising or lowering the grade thereof, it is damaged for public use, but those words do not give an abutting owner a right to recover unless he can show some direct physical disturbance of the right, either public or private, which he enjoys in connection with his property, and which gives an additional value to it, and that by reason of such disturbance he has sustained a special damage over and above that sustained by the public generally.

As actionable wrong.

In the clause of the Constitution providing that private property shall not be taken or damaged for public uses without just and adequate compensation being first paid, the word "damaged" is used in its usual sense, as a law term, and does not change the substantive law of damages, or create a cause of action where none previously existed; nor does it abrogate the principle expressed in the phrase "damnum absque injuria." It refers to actionable wrongs, and does not require compensation for depreciation in the value of private property caused by the lawful operation of a public work owned by a corporation vested with the power of eminent domain, unless a private corporation or private individual would be liable for similar acts under like circumstances; nor is a quasi public corporation liable where private property is depreciated in value as a result of the lawful use and enjoyment of the company's private property. To damage property, within the meaning of the Constitution, there must be some physical interference with property, or physical interference with the right or use appurtenant to property; and therefore a railway company is not liable to the owner of real property for diminution in the market value thereof resulting from the making of noise or from the sending forth of smoke in the prosecution of the company's lawful business. Austin v. Augusta T. Ry. Co., 34 S. E. 852, 853, 108 Ga. 671, 47 L. R. A. 755.

Consequential injury.

The word "damages," as used in statutes relating to condemnation proceedings, includes only damage that is direct and proximate, as distinguished from that which is remote and consequential, and only that which is special and peculiar to the petitioner and to those similarly situated, as distinguished from that which is common, affecting generally persons and property in the vicinity. Baker v. Boston Elevated R. Co., 66 N. E. 711, 712, 183 Mass. 178.

"Damaged," as used in the Constitution of 1870, providing that private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation, means a substantial injury caused by a public improvement, and does not require such injury to be caused by trespass, or an actual, physical invasion of the owner's real estate. It includes an injury caused by such improvement, though it is only consequential. The construction of an improvement in such a way as to cause property to be flooded by freshets, or to cut off the access to a certain street, is a damage, within the meaning of such clause. City of Chicago v. Taylor, 8 Sup. Ct. 820, 823, 125 U. S. 161, 31 L. Ed. 638.

"Damaged," as used in Const. 1867, art. 1, § 21, providing that the property of no person shall be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation therefor, includes all damages which affect the value of a person's property, resulting from the exercise of the right of eminent domain, which diminish the market value of private property. The fact that damages are consequential will not preclude a recovery if the construction and operation of the public improvement is the cause of the injury; and it is not necessary that the damages be caused by trespass, or an actual, physical invasion of the owner's real estate. The test is, excluding general benefits, is the property in fact damaged? If so, the owner is entitled to compensation. If the property is diminished in actual value by reason of a public improvement, it is, to the extent of the diminution, taken for public use, as much as if it was directly appropriated. City of Omaha v. Kramer, 41 N. W. 295, 296, 25 Neb. 489, 13 Am. St. Rep. 504.

Under Const. 1890, art. 3, § 17, declaring that private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use except on due compensation, a recovery may be had in all cases where private property has sustained substantial damage from any improvement public in its character; and it is not requisite to recovery that the damage be caused by a trespass or an actual invasion of the owner's real estate, but, if the construction and operation of the railroad or other improvement is the cause of the damage, though consequential, the party damaged may recover. Chicago & W. I. R. Co. v. Ayres, 106 Ill. 511; Rigney v. City of Chicago, 102 Ill. 64; City of Elgin v. Eaton, 83 Ill. 535, 25 Am. Rep. 412. And hence a city is liable for damages to abutting property for materially lowering the street grade, especially after valuable improvements had been put on the lot according to the prior, established grade. City of Vicksburg v. Herman, 16 South. 434, 435, 72 Miss. 211.

"Damaged," as used in Const. art. 1, § 14, providing that private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation having been first made, refers to something more than a direct or immediate damage to private property, such as its invasion or spoliation. It should be construed in its ordinary and popular sense, and embraces more than the taking. This provision was intended to insure compensation to the owner as well where the damage was directly inflicted, or inflicted by want of care and skill, as where the damages are consequential. The provision includes damage to private property, including land and whatever is attached to it. It does not extend to such damage as the owner injured sustained in common with the other abutters on the street or the general public, but only to that special injury which he receives over and above such common injury. Reardon v. City and County of San Francisco, 6 Pac. 317, 322, 66 Cal. 492, 56 Am. Rep. 109.

Diminution in market value.

"Damaged," as used in the Constitution, providing that private property shall not be taken or damaged for public or private use without just compensation, includes not only direct, physical obstruction or injury to the abutting premises, even though there be no actual appropriation of the ground itself—a kind or class of injuries for which a remedy existed at common law—but also includes the actual diminution in the market value of the premises for any use to which they may reasonably be put, occasioned by the construction and operation of a railroad through the adjacent street. City of Denver v. Bayer, 2 Pac. 6, 9, 7 Colo. 113.

As injuriously affect.

"Damaged," as used in the Bill of Rights (Const. 1875) § 21, declaring that the property of no person shall be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation, should be construed to include all damages arising from the exercise of the right of eminent domain, which cause a diminution in the value of private property. The words "or damaged" did not appear in the section of the Constitution of 1867. Under that Constitution, if any portion of a person's real estate was taken for public use, he could recover all the damages sustained by the taking, but, if none of his real estate was taken for public use, he could recover nothing, though his property had been greatly damaged by such use. The provision, therefore, is remedial in its nature, and the well-known rule that, in the construction of remedial statutes, three points are to be considered, namely, the old law, the mischief, and the remedy, and so to construe the act as to suppress the mischief and advance the remedy, is to be applied. 1 Bl. Comm. 87. Applying this rule to the provisions in question, it must be held to embrace all damages which affect the value of a person's property, and to include cases where the property of the claimant was not itself taken, but was merely damaged by the taking of other property. McGavock v. City of Omaha, 58 N. W. 543, 546, 40 Neb. 64.

As injure.

"Damaged," as used in Const. art. 1, § 17, providing that no person's property shall be taken, damaged, or destroyed for, or applied to, public use, without adequate compensation being made therefor, is to be construed in the same sense in which the word

"injured" is ordinarily understood. By damage is meant every loss or diminution of what is a man's own, occasioned by the fault of another, whether this results directly to the thing owned, or be but an interference with a right which the owner has to the legal and proper use of his own. Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Fuller, 63 Tex. 467, 469.

"Damaged," as used in Const. 1875, art. 1, § 21, providing that the property of no person shall be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation therefor, should be construed as equivalent to "injuriously affect." The object of the Constitution is to grant relief in cases where there is no direct injury to the real estate itself, but some physical disturbance of a right which the owner possesses in connection with his estate, by reason of which he sustains special injury in respect to such property in excess of that sustained by the public at large. It is not necessary, to entitle a party to recover, that there should be a direct physical injury to his property if he has sustained damages in respect to the property itself, whereby its value has been permanently impaired or diminished. Gootschalk v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 16 N. W. 475, 476, 14 Neb. 550.

In the case of Rigney v. City of Chicago, 102 Ill. 64, it was correctly held that the words "or damaged," in Const. 1875, art. 1, § 21, providing that the property of no person shall be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation therefor, were equivalent to the words "injuriously affected," in the English statute. Gootschalk v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 16 N. W. 475, 479, 14 Neb. 550.

Taken distinguished.

The word "damaged," as used in the constitutional provision that no private property shall be taken or damaged for public or private use without just compensation having first been made, does not mean the same thing as "taken," and will not be limited to what was formerly covered by the word "taken" alone. State v. Superior Court of King County, 66 Pac. 385, 389, 28 Wash. 278 (citing Brown v. City of Seattle, 5 Wash. 35, 31 Pac. 313, 32 Pac. 214, 18 L. R. A. 161).

DAMAGE FOR A WRONG.

The word "damages" meaning a compensation, recompense, or satisfaction in money, and "wrong" meaning any deprivation of right, breach of contract, or injury done by one person to another, the words "damages for a wrong" mean money given for a breach of contract, as well as any other deprivation of right or injury to person or property, and include not only money due on contract, but money which one is entitled to recover of another for any reason whatsoever, and is a much broader and explicit expression than "money due on contract." O'Connor v. Dila, 26 S. E. 354, 355, 43 W. Va. 54; Lovings v. Norfolk & W. Ry. Co., 35 S. E. 962, 967, 47 W. Va. 582, 81 Am. St. Rep. 788.

DAMAGE RECOVERED.

The phrase "damages recovered," as used in Rev. St. c. 191, § 4, providing that no more costs than damages shall be recovered in any action in the court of common pleas, unless the damages recovered exceed $13.33, means the damages to which the plaintiff is ultimately found to be entitled on appeal or other proceeding of last resort. Davis v. Clark, 39 N. H. 62, 64.

DAMAGE TO LAND.

The language "damages to land," as used in Rev. St. art. 1194, § 14, providing that suits for the recovery of damages to land must be brought in the county in which the land may lie, has been construed to mean an injury to the possession or to the freehold or estate, so that burning of grass growing on land, by fire, does not constitute damages to land. Knight v. Houston & T. C. Ry. Co., 55 S. W. 558, 93 Tex. 417.

DAMAGE TO THE PERSON.

Where a statute (Acts 1842, c. 89, § 1) provides that an action of trespass on the case for damage to the person shall survive, the term "damage to the person" should be limited to injuries of a physical character, and therefore would not include the damages resulting from a breach of promise of marriage. Smith v. Sherman, 58 Mass. (4 Cush.) 408, 418.

Gen. St. Mass. c. 127, § 1, and c. 128, § 1, declare that actions of tort for assault, battery, imprisonment, or other "damage to the person," survive, and may be prosecuted by the executor or administrator of the party injured. Held, that the phrase would not extend to torts not directly affecting the person, but only the feelings or reputation, such as a breach of promise, slander, or malicious prosecution, but include only every action, the substantial cause of which is a bodily injury. Norton v. Sewall, 106 Mass. 143, 145, 8 Am. Rep. 298.

DAMAGE TO PERSONAL ESTATE.

"Damage to personal estate," as used in Pub. St. c. 165, § 1, providing that actions for "damages done to personal estate" shall survive, does not apply to merely impoverishing a man's estate generally, but means damage to some specific property. Cutter v. Hamlen, 18 N. E. 397, 147 Mass. 471, 1 L. R. A. 429.

DAMN.

"Damn" means "to deem, think, or judge any one to be guilty, to be criminal; to give judgment, or sentence, or doom of guilt; to adjudge or declare the penalty or punishment." Blaufus v. People, 69 N. Y. 107, 111, 25 Am. Rep. 148.

"Damned" is held to import an imprecation of divine vengeance, or to imply divine condemnation, so as to constitute profanity, though not used in connection with the name of the Deity. State v. Wiley, 24 South. 194, 76 Miss. 282, 71 Am. St. Rep. 531 (citing Holcomb v. Cornish, 8 Conn. 375).

The word "damned" when used in a sense importing an imprecation of future divine vengeance, is profane, whether the name of the Deity be called or not; and the words "Arrest, and be damned," spoken to a woman, and used in a manifestly irreverent sense, relative to the Deity, are indictable under Act Dec. 29, 1890, making it a misdemeanor to use profane language in the presence of a woman. Foster v. State, 25 S. E. 613, 99 Ga. 56.

Evidence that a person accused of cursing, used the word "damn," or something to that effect, is insufficient to sustain a conviction. Carr v. City of Conyers, 10 S. E. 630, 631, 84 Ga. 287, 20 Am. St. Rep. 357.

DAMNED SON OF A BITCH.

The term "damned son of a bitch" is not an insulting one, used toward a female relative, but is rather a sudden expression of anger and contempt, and, when used, no one understands it to be directed at the mother of the person to whom used. Simmons v. State, 5 S. W. 208, 209, 23 Tex. App. 653.

DAMNIFIED.

A surety is damnified when a judgment is obtained against him. McLean v. Lafayette Bank (U. S.) 16 Fed. Cas. 264, 278.

DAMNOSA HÆREDITAS.

Property of a bankrupt, which, so far from being available, would be a charge to the creditors, has been called by Lord Kenyon "damnosa hæreditas." Provident Life & Trust Co. v. Fidelity Ins., Trust & Safe Deposit Co., 52 Atl. 34, 37, 203 Pa. 82.

DAMNUM ABSQUE INJURIA.

"Damnum absque injuria" means a loss without an injury. It is a phrase used to describe a loss arising from acts or conditions which do not create a ground of legal redress. Marbury v. Madison, 5 U. S. (1 Cranch) 137, 164, 2 L. Ed. 60; Hession v. City of Wilmington (Del.) 27 Atl. 830, 834; Parker v. Griswold, 17 Conn. 288, 299, 42 Am. Dec. 739; National Exch. Bank v. Sibley, 71 Ga. 726, 734; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Lippin- cott, 116 Pa. 472, 484, 9 Atl. 871, 2 Am. St. Rep. 618.

"Damnum" means only harm, hurt, loss, or damage, while "injuria" comes from "in," against, and "jus," right, and means something done against the right of a party, producing damage, and has no reference to the fact or amount of damage. Unless a right is violated, though there be damage, it is damnum absque injuria. West Virginia Transp. Co. v. Standard Oil Co., 40 S. E. 591, 592, 50 W. Va. 611, 56 L. R. A. 804, 88 Am. St. Rep. 895.

Damages not directly consequent upon the taking of property by the power of eminent domain, but incident to or consequent upon the construction or operation of a public improvement in a prudent and skilled manner, are damnum absque injuria, unless such injuries are to be compensated by the terms of the statute under which the work was prosecuted. High Bridge Lumber Co. v. United States (U. S.) 69 Fed. 320, 326, 16 C. C. A. 460.

"Damnum absque injuria" means a loss which does not give rise to an action for damages against the person causing it, as where a person blocks up the windows of a new house overlooking his land, or injures the person's trade by setting up an establishment of the same kind in the neighborhood. It arises where there is damage done without any wrong or a violation of any right of the plaintiff, but the term does not apply, in a legal sense, in the case of a violation of a right, where no perceptible damage follows, which cannot be established as a matter of fact, or as defined by "injuria sine damno," since actual perceptible damage is not indispensable to the foundation of an action; the plaintiff in such a case being entitled to recover nominal damages. Irwin v. Askew, 74 Ga. 581, 585 (citing National Exch. Bank v. Sibley, 71 Ga. 726, 734).

The maxim "damnum absque injuria" applies only where a wrong is done a party for which the law provides no remedy, and does not affect a right of a riparian owner to redress for the wrongful diversion of a part of the flow of a nonnavigable stream at a point above his mill, and drawn by a water company which uses it to supply a village with water, where such diversion affects injuriously the rights of the riparian owner. Gilzinger v. Saugerties Water Co., 21 N. Y. Supp. 121, 122, 66 Hun. 173.

Where an appreciable damage and loss was occasioned by some act of another, and ~~yet~~ the law gives no redress, the phrase "damnum absque injuria" is applied. Chase v. Silverstone, 62 Me. 175, 176, 16 Am. Rep. 419.

A lease of property adjacent to a railroad, apart from misuse, is "damnum absque injuria." Hasbrouck v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. (Pa.) 1 C. P. Rep. 156.

A bill in equity will lie to restrain the owner of a servient tenement from digging a well so near a spring whose supply depends upon a constant and regular subterranean stream as to divert the water of such spring, to the injury of the owner of the dominant tenement, who had a reserved right to use the water of the spring, as the rule of "damnum absque injuria" would not apply, unless it is made to appear that the spring depended for its supply on percolations through the lands of the complainant. Lybe v. Herr (Pa.) 1 Kulp, 132, 133.

DANGER.

See "Apparent Danger"; "Immediate Danger"; "Latent Dangers"; "Patent Dangers"; "Real Danger"; "Reasonable Danger"; "Unavoidable Danger."

Obvious dangers, see "Obvious Risks."

As used in an indictment charging that the defendant put one in bodily fear and danger of his life, "danger" is equivalent to "jeopardy." "The word 'jeopardy' is defined to be danger; exposed to loss or injury; peril. Jeopard is to put in danger; to expose to loss or injury. Jeopardize is putting in danger." United States v. Mays, 1 Idaho, 763, 770.

DANGERS OF NAVIGATION.

"Dangers of navigation" and "perils of the sea" are generally synonymous, and refer to accidents peculiar to that particular kind of transportation, not occasioned by negligence, and not preventable by the exercise of due care. Jones v. Pitcher (Ala.) 3 Stew. & P. 135, 136; 24 Am. Dec. 716.

"Dangers of navigation," as used in a bill of lading relieving the carrier from liability for the losses caused by dangers of navigation, means only those dangers which are inevitable, and does not excuse the carrier from liability for losses occasioned by his own negligence. The City of Norwich (U. S.) 5 Fed. Cas. 780, 781.

It is well settled that dangers of navigation, in a bill of lading, mean latent dangers, and not such as are or ought to be patent, and are to be avoided by skill, judgment, and foresight, by persons engaged in navigation. Costigan v. Michael Transp. Co., 38 Mo. App. 219, 229 (citing Hill v. Sturgeon, 28 Mo. 323, 327).

An insurance against the "perils of navigation" covers those caused in the navigation of the boat and flowing from the ordinary perils, which come from navigating, including the manner of approaching the land, as well as moving down the stream. Seaman v. Enterprise Fire & Marine Ins. Co. (U. S.) 21 Fed. 778, 783.

Bilging in canal lock.

"Dangers of navigation," as used in a contract exempting a carrier from the dangers of the navigation of a public canal, are such as are incident to it when the trip is made in conformity to the public regulations, of which the carrier is bound to take notice; and hence damage from bilging in a lock, which was entered in contravention to the rules, is not included therein. Atwood v. Reliance Transp. Co. (Pa.) 9 Watts, 87, 88, 34 Am. Dec. 503.

Explosion.

The bursting of a boiler is a peril of the river, within the meaning of a policy of insurance of a steamboat insuring against any perils of rivers, fires, enemies, pirates, rovers, and stealing thieves and all other perils, loss, and misfortunes which should come, to the damage of such steamboat, according to the general laws of insurance. Citizens' Ins. Co. v. Glasgow, 9 Mo. 411, 412.

The explosion of a boiler on a steam vessel is not a "peril of navigation," within the term as used in the exception in bills of lading. The Mohawk, 75 U. S. (8 Wall.) 153, 162, 19 L. Ed. 406.

Fire.

The term "perils of navigation" includes fires not caused by the negligence of a shipowner or his servants. Walker v. Western Transp. Co., 70 U. S. (3 Wall.) 150, 154, 18 L. Ed. 172.

Impassability of canal.

"Dangers of navigation," as used in a bill of lading issued by a canal boat, excepting the boat from liability for loss occasioned by dangers of navigation, did not include a loss occasioned by the fact that the canal became impassable by inevitable accident or otherwise. Hand v. Baynes (Pa.) 4 Whart. 204, 214, 33 Am. Dec. 54.

Running aground.

Dangers of navigation, within an exception contained in a bill of lading, do not include a loss of a part of the cargo by jettison, resorted to in order to lighten the ship after she had run aground, in consequence of the captain's negligence in proceeding into port at night in a fog, where there was proper ground to doubt whether the port was the one which he supposed it to be, and he could safely have waited outside until morning, or could have signaled a tugboat to pilot him in. The Portsmouth, 76 U. S. (9 Wall.) 682, 685, 19 L. Ed. 754.

Shallowness of harbor.

The term "dangers of lake navigation" includes all the ordinary perils which attend navigation and the like, and, among others, that which arises from the shallowness of the

Snags.

In an express company's receipt, reciting the receipt of certain goods to be forwarded to a certain place, perils of navigation and transportation excepted, the term "perils of navigation" embraces more than the act of God, but goes no further than to exempt the carrier from such liabilities as could not be foreseen or avoided in the exercise of care and prudence. The exception does not excuse the carrier for negligently running into snags in a river. The proper construction is synonymous with that which is put upon the words "perils of the sea" or "dangers of the lake" in bills of lading. Christenson v. American Exp. Co., 15 Minn. 270, 280 (Gil. 208, 213), 2 Am. Rep. 122 (citing Fairchild v. Slocum [N. Y.] 19 Wend. 329, 332; Whitesides v. Thurlkill, 20 Miss. [12 Smedes & M.] 599, 51 Am. Dec. 123; Hays v. Kennedy, 41 Pa. [5 Wright] 378, 80 Am. Dec. 627; Edw. Bailm. 492-496).

"Dangers of navigation," as used in a bill of lading excepting from the carrier's liability for loss such losses as might be caused by the dangers of navigation and all other known and unknown obstructions, includes a loss caused without negligence on the part of the carrier's servants by striking a tree under water, which, unknown to them, had shortly before fallen into the river. Hibernia Ins. Co. v. St. Louis & N. O. Transp. Co., 7 Sup. Ct. 550, 120 U. S. 166, 30 L. Ed. 621.

Vermin on shipboard.

"Dangers of navigation," as used in a bill of lading exempting a carrier from loss occasioned by the dangers of navigation, does not include a damage to the cargo caused by vermin on board the ship. The Miletus (U. S.) 17 Fed. Cas. 288, 289.

DANGERS OF THE RIVER.

"Dangers of the river" are such dangers as cannot be guarded against by human skill or foresight. Johnson v. Friar, 12 Tenn. (4 Yerg.) 48, 51, 26 Am. Dec. 215; Jones v. Pitcher (Ala.) 3 Stew. & P. 135, 177, 24 Am. Dec. 716; Turney v. Wilson, 15 Tenn. (7 Yerg.) 340, 343; Gordon v. Buchanan, 13 Tenn. (5 Yerg.) 71, 82; Grey's Ex'r v. Mobile Trading Co., 55 Ala. 387, 398, 28 Am. Rep. 729; Hill v. Sturgeon, 28 Mo. 323, 327.

The words "dangers of the river" mean only the natural accidents incident to river navigation, and do not embrace such as may be avoided by the exercise of that skill, judgment, or foresight which are demanded from persons in a particular occupation.

Hill v. Sturgeon, 35 Mo. 212, 213, 86 Am. Dec. 149.

The phrase "dangers of the river," when used in a bill of lading, has no such plain, certain meaning as will preclude the admission of parol testimony to show, according to the usage and custom of merchants, what casualties such phrase includes. It may be shown by parol testimony that the phrase includes casualties other than those arising from the element of water. Sampson v. Gazzam (Ala.) 6 Port. 123, 132, 30 Am. Dec. 578; Gordon v. Little (Pa.) 8 Serg. & R. 533, 551, 11 Am. Dec. 632.

Where the force of the current of the river at a certain point in the time of a freshet, and the increased danger arising from a tree on the bank, were well known to the skipper, loss arising from the boat being swept under the tree and a portion of the cargo brushed off was not a "danger of the river"; for there was no tempest or irresistible impulse of natural causes, but a fixed and well-known danger, which every man accustomed to the navigation would calculate upon meeting, if he proceeded on the voyage at such a time. Williams v. Branson, 5 N. C. 417, 419, 4 Am. Dec. 562.

The exception in a bill of lading of the "dangers of the river which are unavoidable," narrows down the liability of the owner of the boat. Many disasters which would not come within the definition of the act of God would fall within the exception of this receipt, such, for instance, as losses occasioned by hidden obstructions in the river, newly placed there, and of a character that human skill and foresight could not have avoided. Gordon v. Buchanan, 13 Tenn. (5 Yerg.) 71, 82.

The words "dangers of the river" mean "all hidden obstructions in the river," as rocks, logs, sawyers, and the like, and which could not be foreseen or avoided by human prudence or foresight. Turney v. Wilson, 15 Tenn. (7 Yerg.) 340, 343.

A policy insuring a vessel, the dangers of the river only excepted, does not seem to be sufficiently broad to cover any casualty which is not peculiar to the navigation of that river. It is like the exceptions in bills of lading given by vessels navigating the sea, in which "perils of the sea" are the words employed, by which natural accidents peculiar to that element are meant, accidents which do not happen by the intervention of man, and which cannot be prevented by human prudence. Gilmore v. Carman, 9 Miss. (1 Smedes & M.) 279, 304, 40 Am. Dec. 96.

Careening of boat.

Where cotton is thrown into a river by the careening of a steamboat on which it was loaded, the injury to the cotton was caused by the perils of the river, within the meaning of an insurance policy providing that the liability and perils assumed by the company are of the rivers, fires, jettisons, and other perils and losses caused by reason of such dangers. Crescent Ins. Co. v. Vicksburg, Y. & S. R. Packet Co., 13 South. 254, 255, 69 Miss. 208, 30 Am. St. Rep. 537.

Dangers of the river, insured against in a marine policy, include a loss by collision. Van Horn v. Taylor (La.) 7 Rob. 201, 202, 41 Am. Dec. 279.

Collision.

A loss by collision without fault of the carrier boat is within a bill of lading excepting the carrier from liability from unavoidable dangers of the river. Hayes v. Kennedy (Pa.) 2 Pittsb. R. 262, 263; The Favorite (U. S.) Fed. Cas. 1103; Whitesides v. Thurlkill, 20 Miss. (12 Smedes & M.) 599, 600, 51 Am. Dec. 128; Jones v. Pitcher (Ala.) 3 Stew. & P. 135, 176, 24 Am. Dec. 716.

Fire.

Dangers of the river are those known dangers which are incident to the river, and include dangers by fire. The Belfast, 40 Ala. 184, 188, 88 Am. Dec. 761. As used in a bill of lading exempting the carrier therefrom, "dangers of the river" meant, not only dangers arising from the navigation, but dangers by fire. Hibler v. McCartney, 31 Ala. 501, 506.

In construing a bill of lading for the transportation of goods on a steamboat navigating the Mississippi, providing that the carrier should not be liable for losses occasioned by the perils of the river, it was held that the term "perils of the river" did not include fire, although the boat was consumed without any negligence or fault of the owners or their agents or servants. Garrison v. Memphis Ins. Co., 60 U. S. (19 How.) 312, 314, 15 L. Ed. 656.

It is settled in this state that it is permissible for the owner of a steamboat, when sued for the loss of goods by fire, to show by parol that by custom and usage the words "dangers of the river" in a bill of lading include dangers by fire. McClure v. Cox, 32 Ala. 617, 621, 70 Am. Dec. 552.

Dangers of the river are dangers such as collisions, rocks, snags, etc., and do not include a loss by fire. Garrison v. Memphis Ins. Co., 60 U. S. (19 How.) 312, 314, 15 L. Ed. 656.

Leakage.

The phrase "dangers of the river," as used in a bill of lading relieving a carrier from liability for losses occasioned thereby, means such inevitable dangers only as result from a known cause. An unknown cause, producing a leaky boat, is not within the meaning of the phrase. Louisville & N.

R. Co. v. Manchester Mills, 14 S. W. 314, 316, 88 Tenn. (4 Pickle) 653 (citing Turney v. Wilson, 15 Tenn. [7 Yerg.] 340).

"A loss by perils of the sea or dangers of river navigation includes such losses only to the cargo as are of an extraordinary nature, or arise from irresistible force, or from inevitable accident, or from some overwhelming power, which cannot be guarded against by the ordinary exertions of human skill and prudence. If the loss occurs by a peril which might have been avoided by the exercise of any reasonable skill or diligence at the time when it occurred, it is not deemed to be, in the sense of the phrase, such a loss by the perils of the sea or the dangers of the river as will exempt the carrier from liability, but rather a loss by his gross neglect. A loss from the effect of storm and tempest in straining the ship, or causing her to spring a leak or ship a sea, whereby damage or injury is done to the goods on board, are losses perfectly attributable to the perils of the sea, although in a mitigated sense they may be said to be ordinary accidents." The Northern Belle (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 349, 350.

Low water.

Low water is not to be classed among the "dangers of the river" which absolve a carrier from his obligation. Mahon v. The Olive Branch, 18 La. Ann. 107, 108

New and unknown reefs.

An exception in a bill of lading, exempting the carrier from losses caused by the dangers of the river, fire, and collision, includes a loss caused without negligence on the part of the carrier's agents or servants by running into a sand reef recently formed in the channel of the river, which they had no reason to suppose was there. Hibernia Ins. Co. v. St. Louis & N. O. Transp. Co., 7 Sup. Ct. 550, 120 U. S. 166, 30 L. Ed. 621.

"The phrase 'dangers of the river,' as used in bills of lading, includes dangers arising from unknown reefs, which have suddenly formed in the channel, and are not discoverable by care and skill." Hibernia Ins. Co. v. St. Louis & N. O. Transp. Co. (U. S.) 17 Fed. 478.

DANGERS OF THE SEA.

See "Perils of the Sea."

DANGEROUS.

The word "dangerous" means "attended with danger; perilous; full of risk." West v. Ward, 42 N. W. 309, 310, 77 Iowa, 323, 14 Am. St. Rep. 284.

The word "dangerous" is the opposite of the word "safe." When a given place in a highway ceases to be safe, it becomes dangerous. Coates v. Town of Canaan, 51 Vt. 131, 137.

"Dangerous" is defined by Webster as "attended or beset with danger; full of risk; perilous; hazardous; unsafe." An instruction leaving the jury to determine whether a brakeman compelled a trespasser to leave the train when it was dangerous to do so was not erroneous, as permitting a verdict without reference to degree of danger or whether the train was in motion or not. Texas & P. Ry. Co. v. Mother, 24 S. W. 79, 82, 5 Tex. Civ. App. 87.

As defective.

A place in a highway which is so "dangerous" that it would be improper and negligent to attempt to pass over it cannot be construed to mean a place not perfectly safe, since the mere fact that a street is defective does not necessarily show that an attempt to pass over it is negligence. Fox v. City of Chelsea, 50 N. E. 622, 623, 171 Mass. 297.

The words "unsound and dangerous," as applied to a city sidewalk, may mean so rotten as to be dangerous. Therefore a notice specifying that the walk was "unsound and dangerous" was held to sufficiently notify the city that the walk was defective. Van Frachen v. City of Ft. Howard, 60 N. W. 1062, 1063, 88 Wis. 570.

DANGEROUS BUSINESS.

Other dangerous trade or business, see "Other."

A business is dangerous, within the meaning of a covenant not to erect on certain lands manufactories for use in a dangerous trade, where a paraffine oil mill is erected, in which the furnace and stills are kept at an unusual and extreme heat, which, with a lurid flame from the smokestack, give to all persons in the neighborhood reasonable apprehension of danger. Atlantic Dock Co. v. Libby, 45 N. Y. 499, 508.

A distillery, used for the manufacture of resin oil, was a dangerous business, within the covenants of a deed prohibiting the use of the premises for such a purpose. Atlantic Dock Co. v. Leavitt, 50 Barb. 135, 141, 54 N. Y. 35, 13 Am. Rep. 556.

DANGEROUS CONDITION

The dangerous condition of a street means something more, when applied to a building excavation therein, than to the accumulation of materials in the neighborhood of a building undergoing erection or repair, or the excavation, more or less deep, which is needed in order to put down a sidewalk. A temporary state of disorder is absolutely inseparable from improvements of certain kinds. A street or sidewalk is rendered impassable or partially impassable during the process of work, and all that can be demanded of a city under such circumstances is the taking of due care or the enforcement of regulations made for securing passengers of ordinary prudence from danger. Schweickhardt v. City of St. Louis, 2 Mo. App. 571, 580.

DANGEROUS AND CONTAGIOUS DISEASE.

The term "dangerous contagious disease," as used in the chapter relating to the public health in cities, shall be construed and understood to mean such diseases as the state board of health shall designate as contagious and dangerous to the public health. Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. Wash. 1897, § 1238.

DANGEROUS EXPOSURE.

Dangerous exposure, sufficient to render a vessel being so exposed in fault for a collision, means "not a mere possibility of an injury through some mischance not reasonably likely to occur, but an exposure that is naturally liable to receive or inflict the injury in the ordinary chances, mistakes, or hazards of navigation, such as are to be reasonably apprehended as liable to arise." Per Brown, J., in The Mary Powell (U. S.) 31 Fed. 622, 624 (cited in The Michigan [U. S.] 52 Fed. 501, 504).

DANGEROUS INSTRUMENT.

An iron flywheel, a few feet in diameter and a few inches in thickness, is not a dangerous instrument, though one part may be weaker than another. Dangerous instruments are instruments and articles in their nature calculated to do injury to mankind, and generally intended to accomplish that purpose. They are such as are essentially and in their elements instruments of danger. The flywheel, not being in its nature a source of danger, cannot be called a dangerous instrument. That an injury actually occurred by the bursting of the wheel does not in the least alter its character. Loop v. Litchfield, 42 N. Y. 351, 359, 1 Am. Rep. 513.

DANGEROUS MACHINE.

A locomotive charged with steam to propel trains of cars is a dangerous machine, and the duty imposed upon a railroad company which it owes to its employees is that such locomotive shall be kept and maintained in a safe and proper condition. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Barrett (U. S.) 67 Fed. 214, 218, 14 C. C. A. 373.

The phrase, "dangerous and enticing machine," within the rule that a dangerous and enticing machine should not be left where the natural and probable results would be that it would cause injury to children, includes a lump of common gunpowder, containing pieces of brass. Travell v. Bannerman, 75 N. Y. Supp. 886, 887, 71 App. Div. 439.

DANGEROUS MACHINERY.

Whether the term "dangerous machinery" includes revolving shafting is a question which may be made the subject of expert testimony. Pullman's Palace Car Co. v. Harkins (U. S.) 55 Fed. 932, 935, 5 C. C. A. 326.

DANGEROUS WEAPON.

See "Assault with Dangerous Weapon"; "Sharp Dangerous Weapon."

Other sharp or dangerous weapon, see "Other."

"Dangerous weapon," as used in Rev. St. § 794, providing that whoever shall with a dangerous weapon inflict a wound, etc., shall be punished, etc., means a weapon which may be dangerous "by its use or in itself." State v. Scott, 3 South. 83, 84, 39 La. Ann. 943.

✕ "Dangerous weapon," as used in 4 Stat. 121, providing a punishment for making an assault with a dangerous weapon, means "a weapon which is dangerous to life in the manner in which it is used in the assault." United States v. Small (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 1128.

"A dangerous weapon is one liable to produce death or great bodily harm." United States v. Reeves (U. S.) 38 Fed. 404, 406. Some weapons under particular circumstances are so clearly lethal that the court may declare them to be such as a matter of law. Of this class are guns, swords, knives, pistols, and the like, when used within striking distance of the victim. All others are lethal or not, according to their capability to produce death or great bodily harm in the manner in which they are used, and of this the jury must always be the judges. An unloaded gun in the hands of a defendant four or five rods from the prosecuting witness is not a dangerous weapon. State v. Godfrey, 20 Pac. 625, 626, 628, 17 Or. 300, 11 Am. St. Rep. 830.

✕ A dangerous weapon is one that is dangerous to life, and this must often depend upon the manner of using it, and the question should go to the jury. In many cases the court may declare that a particular weapon was or was not a dangerous weapon, and when practicable it is the duty of the court to do so; but where the weapon might be dangerous or not according to the manner in which it was used or the part of the body struck, the question must be left to the jury. State v. Hammond, 86 N. W. 627, 629, 14 S. D. 545.

While "deadly" and "dangerous" are not equivalents, "deadly" is more than the equivalent, and includes the full signification of dangerous. A dangerous weapon may possibly not be deadly, but a deadly weapon, one which is capable of causing death, must be dangerous. State v. Lynch, 33 Atl. 978, 979, 88 Me. 195.

A dangerous weapon includes a saw or dirk in the hands of a robber, by means or under terror of which a person is robbed of the mail, within the meaning of an act punishing robbery of the mail, though it is not drawn or pointed at the breast of the driver at the time, and a pistol in the hands of the robber, by means of which the carrier is robbed of the mail, is a dangerous weapon. United States v. Wood (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 754, 755.

Ax.

The term "dangerous weapon," within the meaning of a statute providing that it shall be criminal to make an assault with intent to kill with a dangerous weapon, etc., includes an ax. In so holding, the court cites State v. Jacob, 10 La. Ann. 141, in which a pocketknife was held to be a dangerous weapon within the meaning of the statute. State v. Hertzog, 41 La. Ann. 775, 777, 6 South. 622, 623.

Knife.

A jackknife may be regarded as a "dangerous" weapon; whether it is such depending on circumstances. Commonwealth v. O'Brien, 119 Mass. 342, 347, 20 Am. Rep. 325.

On trial for assault with a dangerous weapon, an instruction that, if the knife used by defendant was shown by the evidence to be an ordinary pocketknife, such as is commonly used by planters for proper purposes, and was not specially provided by the accused for the occasion, it was not a dangerous weapon within the meaning of the law, was properly refused. State v. Jacob, 10 La. Ann. 141, 142.

Pistol.

A loaded pistol is a dangerous weapon, so that one who fires a pistol at another who is within shooting distance, or in the direction where he is standing, merely with intent to frighten him, is guilty of an assault with a dangerous weapon. State v. Baker, 38 Atl. 653, 654, 20 R. I. 275, 78 Am. St. Rep. 863.

A dangerous weapon is one liable to produce death or great bodily injury. A loaded pistol is not only a dangerous, but a deadly, weapon. United States v. Williams (U. S.) 2 Fed. 61, 64.

A pistol is a dangerous weapon, within the meaning of the statute providing for the punishment of those who rob the United States mail by putting in jeopardy the life of the person having charge thereof by the use of dangerous weapons. United States v. Wilson (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 699, 708.

"Dangerous weapon," as used in Act Cong. March 3, 1825, § 22, requires the weapon to have been dangerous to life as actually used, so that a small pistol, when loaded, while undoubtedly a dangerous weapon, would not be dangerous, if not loaded, when used only to push and strike with. So the thing said to be used may, in the hand of a strong man, be capable of endangering the life by a blow on the head, but not dangerous to life if the arm or leg is struck with it. United States v. Small (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 1128.

"In one sense a pistol, even unloaded, is a dangerous weapon as a matter of law; but whether it is a dangerous weapon, within the meaning of the statute against carrying concealed weapons, is to a great extent a question of fact, depending on the proposition whether at the date of the alleged offense it was carried for use as a weapon." State v. Larkin, 24 Mo. App. 410, 412.

Razor.

Rev. St. § 932, providing a punishment for any one who shall carry concealed certain specified weapons, or other dangerous weapons, does not include a razor. State v. Nelson, 38 La. Ann. 942, 944, 58 Am. Rep. 202.

Stone.

"A dangerous weapon is one likely to produce death or great bodily harm. A stone may or may not be a dangerous weapon, depending upon its size and other circumstances." State v. Dineen, 10 Minn. 407, 411 (Gil. 325, 327).

Timber.

"Dangerous weapon," as used in Acts No. 43 and 44 of 1890, which impose punishment on any one who shall shoot, stab, cut, strike, or thrust any person with a dangerous weapon, etc., means any weapon which is likely to produce death or great bodily injury, and includes a large piece of timber. State v. Alfred, 10 South. 887, 44 La. Ann. 582.

DARK BAY.

The term "dark bay mare mule," in an indictment charging that defendant obtained credit by false representations in mortgaging a dark bay mare mule, is not so descriptive of a mouse-colored mare mule that evidence of such representations as to the latter mule will sustain a conviction. Berrien v. State, 9 S. E. 609, 83 Ga. 381.

DARKNESS.

"Darkness" is sometimes defined as an absence of light, so that, where a complaint alleged that an injury was caused on account of the "darkness" at an excavation, defendant, under a general denial, could have introduced testimony showing that a light was maintained at this excavation; the question of light or darkness being put in issue by the complaint and denial. Collett v. Northern Pac. Ry. Co., 63 Pac. 225, 227, 23 Wash. 600.

DATE.

"The primary signification of the word 'date' is not time in the abstract, nor time taken absolutely, but, as its derivation plainly indicates, time given or specified; time in some way ascertained and fixed. This is the sense in which the word is commonly used. When we speak of the date of a deed, we do not mean the time when it is actually executed, but the time of its execution as given or stated in the deed itself. The date of an item or of a charge in a book account is not necessarily the time when the article charged was in fact furnished, but simply the time given or set down in the account in connection with such charge." As used in Nix. Dig. p. 527 (revised page 671), providing that a mechanic's lien cannot be enforced unless the summons on the suit for that purpose shall be issued within one year from the "date" of the last work done or materials furnished in such claim, "date" must be taken to mean the time when such work was done or materials furnished as specified in the plaintiff's written claim. Bement v. Trenton Locomotive & Machine Mfg. Co., 32 N. J. Law (3 Vroom) 513, 515.

The word "date," in 55 Geo. III, c. 185, requiring certain bills, not exceeding two months after date, to bear a certain stamp, means the period of payment expressed on the face of the bill. Upstone v. Marchant. 2 Barn. & C. 10, 11.

In Comp. St. c. 80, art. 1, § 16, providing that forfeiture of sales of educational lands may be entered after 90 days from the date of such published notice, the word "date" means the appointed time at which the event or publication takes place, and not the date inserted in the public notice. State v. Henton, 67 N. W. 443, 445, 48 Neb. 488.

Laws 1880, c. 550, § 6, providing that the commissioners of assessment appointed to determine what relief should be awarded in respect to each lot or parcel of land affected by the improvement should in each case file a certificate, and that from the filing of the certificate the amount fixed thereby, with interest from the date thereof, should be the extent of the lien, should be construed to mean the date of the filing of the certificate; for it is the filing which gives the decision of the commissioners its vitality, authority, and force, and not the written statement on the certificate as to when it was made or written. The word "date" does not always mean such statement, but as frequently means the time when an event has happened, as, for instance, the date of a battle, a birth, a death, etc. Smith v. City of New York, 4 N. Y. Supp. 449.

As day, month, and year.

A complete date always includes the year, month, and day, so that where a testator, in an olographic will, only wrote the month and day of the month in his own handwriting, the year being printed on the paper used, the requirement that an olographic will, including date, must be entirely in the handwriting of testator, was not complied with. Succession of Robertson, 21 South. 586, 587, 49 La. Ann. 868, 62 Am. St. Rep. 672.

"Date" means the same in its legal as in its ordinary sense, and imports the day of the month, the month, and the year; the day of the month being as essential a part of the date as the month or the year. A requirement that a will be dated extends to every part of the date. Heffner v. Heffner, 20 South. 281, 48 La. Ann. 1088.

A note dated March 4, 1885, promising to pay "on the 5th of March after date," should be construed as maturing on the 5th of March, 1886, rather than on the 5th of March, 1885, as the date of the note included the month and year, as well as the date on which it was executed. Neal v. Reams, 14 S. E. 617, 88 Ga. 298.

"Date," as used in Act 1872, § 10 (St. 1872, p. 813), requiring a date to be affixed to the warrant issued by the superintendent of streets, authorizing the collection of street assessments by the contractor doing the work, includes the month and day of the month, as well as the year. Shipman v. Forbes, 32 Pac. 599, 97 Cal. 572.

As referring to fraction of day.

In Gen. St. 1894, § 5309, providing that service of summons upon the garnishee shall bind all property in his hands at the date of such service, the date means time of the service of summons, and will not be construed to mean during the day of such service. McLean v. Sworts, 71 N. W. 925, 926, 69 Minn. 128, 65 Am. St. Rep. 556.

"Prior in date," as used in a policy of insurance, referring to other policies on the same risk, the expression was equivalent to "prior in time," and therefore fractions of days might be considered in deciding the priority. Brown v. Hartford Ins. Co. (Conn.) 3 Day, 58, 67.

The date of the deed is not the hour or minute when the deed was executed, but a memorandum of the day when the deed was delivered. This day in a legal sense is an indivisible point of time, there being no fraction of a day. On this principle the day on which the instrument is dated, in the computation of time, is excluded. Oatman v. Walker, 33 Me. 67, 71.

As figures or words.

The date of the commission of an offense, as set forth in the indictment, is the allegation of the day of the month and the year in words at length, and not the representing of such time by the use of figures. Finch v. State (Ind.) 6 Blackf. 533.

Of appointment.

The phrases "after date of appointment" and "from such date," in Rev. St. § 1556 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1067], relative to the annual pay of assistant surgeons in the navy, and providing for increases thereof after the expiration of so many years after date of appointment, or from such date, refers, not to the original entry of the officer into the service as an assistant surgeon, but to the notification by the Secretary of the Navy that he has passed his examination for promotion to the grade of surgeon. United States v. Moore, 95 U. S. 760, 761, 24 L. Ed. 588.

Of bankruptcy.

"Date of bankruptcy," as used in the bankruptcy act, with reference to time, shall mean the date when the petition was filed. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3419.

Of deed.

A statute requiring a mortgage to be recorded within a certain number of days from its date refers to the date of the delivery of the deed, and not to the date stated in the testimonium clause. Orcutt v. Moore, 134 Mass. 48, 52, 45 Am. Rep. 278.

When there is no date in a deed, or an impossible date, a reference in the deed to its date is construed to mean delivery. But, where there is a sensible date, that word in other parts of the deed means the day of the date, and not of the delivery. All the authorities give a definite meaning to the word "date" in general, but show that it may have a different meaning when that is necessary, ut res valeat. Styles v. Wardle, 4 Barn. & C. 908.

Of foreclosure sale.

The "date of the foreclosure sale," in an agreement between a judgment creditor and an insolvent railway for reorganization, the creditors assigning their judgment to the reorganizers in consideration of first mortgage bonds of the new company, it being provided that such bonds should be delivered within six months after the date of the foreclosure sale, meant the date when the sale was completed, and not merely the date when the property was bid off, or the date of the confirmation. Houston, E. & W. T. Ry. Co. v. Keller, 90 Tex. 214, 220, 37 S. W. 1062, 1065.

Of issue.

The expression "date of issue," as used in Act Wash. March 29, 1890, requiring bonds by a city to bear the date of their issue, should be construed in the sense in which it is used in financial parlance, in which, when applied to notes, bonds, etc., of a series, it usually means the arbitrary date fixed as the beginning of the term for which they are to run, without reference to the precise time when convenience or the state of the market may permit of their sale or delivery. Yesler v. City of Seattle, 25 Pac. 1014, 1019, 1 Wash. St. 308; Gage v. McCord (Ariz.) 51 Pac. 977, 979.

In Act Cong. March 7, 1861, § 16 (12 Stat. 246), providing that all patents hereafter granted shall remain in force for the term of 17 years from the date of issue, and all extensions of such patents are hereby prohibited, date of issue means the time from which they date, which may be any time within six months prior to the actual issue, and does not mean the date when such patents were actually issued. De Florez v. Reynolds (U. S.) 8 Fed. 434, 442.

Of original importation.

Rev. St. § 2970, providing that any merchandise deposited in bond in any public or private bonded warehouse may be withdrawn for consumption within one year from the date of the original importation, means the date of the arrival of the goods at the interior port of destination. Farwell v. Spalding (U. S.) 24 Fed. 18.

Of sale.

"Date of sale," as used in a statute requiring all actions to redeem land from a tax sale to be made within five years after the date of sale, means the date on which the land is sold, and does not mean the date on which possession is taken under such sale. Mitchell v. Etter, 22 Ark. 178, 181.

DATED ON THE GROUND.

A notice of location of a placer mining claim, which contains the name of the locators, the date of location, and a sufficient description, all as required by Rev. St. § 2324 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1426], is not invalidated by the fact that the date is preceded by the words "dated on the ground"; for such words neither add to nor take away from the notice any essential requisite thereof, and constitute a mere surplusage of words. Preston v. Hunter (U. S.) 67 Fed. 996, 998, 15 C. C. A. 148.

DAUGHTER.

A daughter is an immediate female descendant, and not an adopted daughter, a stepdaughter, or a daughter-in-law; and hence an indictment charging incest with defendant's daughter is sufficient. People v. Kaiser, 51 Pac. 702, 703, 119 Cal. 456.

The words "daughter of B.," in a notice by a town furnishing support to paupers to the town liable therefor, that the former has furnished the support to B. and the daughter of B., is not a sufficient designation of the daughter. Chichester v. Pembroke, 2 N. H. 530, 531.

All descendants in direct line.

The word "daughters," though generally applicable only to the children of the first degree, is sometimes used to signify all the descendants in the direct line. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 3556, subd. 27.

Daughter of full age.

Under Gen. St. 1878, c. 66, § 83, providing that a father, or, in case of his death or desertion of his family, the mother, may prosecute as plaintiff for seduction of the daughter, the word "daughter" does not mean the same as child, or minor child, but will include a daughter of full age. Schmit v. Mitchell, 61 N. W. 140, 59 Minn. 251.

Grandchild.

"Daughter," as used in a will devising property to testator's sons in trust for his "daughter," should be construed in a representative sense, meaning daughter and her children. Buchanan v. Lloyd, 41 Atl. 1075, 1077, 88 Md. 642.

A testator devised a remainder of his estate to the sons and daughters of A. At the date of the will some were dead and some were living. Held that, though the testator was aware of this fact, their deaths not having been alluded to in the will, and they being therein regarded as alive, and the instrument showing that its object was to provide a share of the testator's bounty for the children of those deceased, the words "sons and daughters of A." did not mean those merely who were alive at the death of the testator, but included as well the descendants of A.'s children who were dead at that time, who were entitled to the share which their ancestors, if living, would have taken. Jamison v. Hay, 46 Mo. 546.

The general rule is that when an express limitation to a particular class of issue by an appropriate term of designation, as "son" or "daughter," is followed by the words, "In default of issue or other kindred thereto," introducing an ulterior devise, these words are referable to the object of that limitation, and not to an indefinite failure of issue. They ordinarily do not refer to issue at large, and therefore do not commonly furnish ground for implication of an estate tail in the first degree. Haldeman v. Haldeman, 40 Pa. 29, 35.

Illegitimate child.

"Daughter," as used in an indictment charging one with having carnal intercourse with his daughter, should be construed to include an illegitimate, as well as a legitimate, child. State v. Laurence, 95 N. C. 659.

When the word "daughter" is employed in a will, the presumption of law is that a legitimate child is intended. Ward v. Epsy, 25 Tenn. (6 Humph.) 447, 450.

DAY.

See "Civil Day"; "Clear Days"; "Election Day"; "Entire Day"; "Judicial Day"; "Law Day"; "Legal Day"; "Natural Day"; "Next Day"; "Nonjudicial Day"; "School Day"; "Sixth Day"; "Whole Day."

The term "day," as used in contradistinction to "night," in determining whether a breaking and entering had been in the nighttime, as required to constitute burglary, as said by Blackstone, "anciently was accounted to begin only at sunrise and to end immediately upon sunset; but the better opinion seems to be that, if there be daylight or crepusculum enough begun or left to discern a man's face withal, it is no burglary. But this does not extend to moonlight." Nicholls v. State, 32 N. W. 543, 545, 68 Wis. 416, 60 Am. Rep. 870 (citing 4 Bl. Comm. 224); Klieforth v. State, 59 N. W. 507, 508, 88 Wis. 163, 43 Am. St. Rep. 875; State v. McKnight, 16 S. E. 319, 320, 111 N. C. 690.

Under the rule as to the entry of actions, requiring that no civil action shall be entered after the second day of the term, and requiring all pleas in abatement to be filed within the first four days of the term, the practice has been to consider the court open for such entry of actions and filing of pleas during the entire days named, without reference to the adjournments of court, except when the session shall terminate within such time. Colby v. Knapp, 13 N. H. 175, 177.

As eight hours.

In all contracts hereafter made between any owner, lessee, or operator of any coal mine, with any miner or laborer for his services as such, the word day, when used, shall be construed to be eight hours. Rev. St. Wyo. 1899, § 2587.

As indivisible point of time.

A day is an indivisible point of time, except where it must be cut up to prevent injustice. In the sense of the statute relating to the computation of time—that is, of the days within which a certain act must be performed—it has neither length nor breadth, but simply position, without magnitude. If the time for redemption is fixed at one day after a sale, that day could not be the day of the sale. The time mentioned must be the following day. Edmundson v. Wragg, 104 Pa. St. 500, 502, 49 Am. Rep. 590; Maxwell v. Jacksonville Loan & Improvement Co. (Fla.) 34 South. 253, 265.

A "day," in legal consideration, is punctum temporis, and the law knows no fraction of it; and yet, when justice requires, this maxim yields, and the exact time when an act was performed may be shown by parol evidence. Brainard v. Bushnell, 11 Conn. 16, 17, 24.

A day is in law and in fact some period of a year which is the shortest ordinarily recognized at common law. Attorney General v. Borough of Anglesea, 33 Atl. 971, 58 N. J. Law (20 Vroom) 372.

A day is a continuous period of 24 hours commencing at midnight, as the unit of measure, and in law no notice of fractions therein is taken; but it is considered more accurately as a point, and therefore indivisible. The legal fiction that a day is an indivisible point of time is not always adhered to. Ordinarily it works no injustice, but is useful for convenience, and often necessary for certainty of computation. Cummins v. Holmes, 11 Ill. App. (11 Bradw.) 158, 161.

In a computation of time within which legal obligations must be performed, is the entire 24 hours, beginning at 12 o'clock p. m., and extending until 12 o'clock the next night. Fractions of a day in statutes or legal proceedings, or in contracts, are not generally considered. However, when the rights of parties depend on the precedence of time in the same day, or upon the given hour or fraction of a day, it may be alleged or proved as any other fact. Towell v. Hollweg, 81 Ind. 154, 158.

It is a well-known rule of the common law that a day comprises 24 hours, extending from midnight to midnight, including morning, evening, and night, and is called a "natural day." When a day is spoken of in law, it comprehends that period of time. When an act is to be done on a particular day, it may be done at any time between those hours; and, of course, a prohibition to do an act on a particular day must comprise the same period. Lord Coke says of "days": "Some are natural, and some are artificial." The natural day consists of 24 hours, and comprehends the solar day and the night, and therefore, in indictments of burglary and the like, we say "in the night" of the same day. Fox v. Abel, 2 Conn. 541, 542 (citing Co. Litt. 135).

In a contract providing that a certain act must be performed within eight days, fractions of days are not to be regarded; but the term means full days, and therefore the day on which the act is done is to be counted as a whole day. Brown v. Buzan, 24 Ind. 194, 195.

Code Civ. Proc. § 3251, relating to the taxation of costs by the clerk, and providing that the costs are "for the trial of an issue of fact $30, and, when the trial necessarily occupied more than two days, $10 in addition thereto," does not mean that, in computing the time, fractions of days are to be considered as whole days, so as to entitle the defendants to the extra costs for a trial commenced in the evening of one day and continued to the morning of the second day thereafter, but meant the time actually employed in the trial of the case, in the same manner as if speaking of a day's work or labor. Washburne v. Oliver (N. Y.) 62 How. Prac. 482, 483.

The law ordinarily takes no notice of portions or fractions of a day. It is only where the precise hour becomes material, as, for instance, in ascertaining the priority of liens, that a different rule obtains. Haden v. Buddensick (N. Y.) 49 How. Prac. 241, 246.

Act March 12, 1875 (1 Rev. St. 1876, p. 467), declares that the sheriffs of the several counties of the state shall tax and charge for boarding each prisoner 60 cents per day. Held that the word "day," in this connection, was not used to designate an indivisible unit of time to be so paid for, nor was such statute an example of the rule that the court would not take judicial notice of divisions or fractions of a day, so as to authorize the sheriff to charge full fees for the board of a prisoner during the third or half of a day, but the word "day" was used as a divisible unit, from which the actual amount due the sheriff might be ascertained by computation. Pressley v. Marion County Com'rs, 80 Ind. 45, 47.

As used in Code Civ. Proc. tit. 7, § 6, providing for the attachment of range stock running and roaming at large, and defining what shall constitute a sufficient service of process between the 1st day of November and the next succeeding 15th day of May, and that certain copies and notices shall be filed with the recorder of the county wherein such property is running at large, should be construed to include any hour of the 24 hours of a day, so that a filing in the office of the recorder on the 14th day of May, in the nighttime, at 10:30 p. m., was such a filing on the 14th day as to be deemed public records and to import notice. Blackstone gives this definition: "In the space of a day the 24 hours are generally reckoned; the law generally rejecting all fractions of a day in order to avoid disputes." Harmon v. Com- stock Horse & Cattle Co., 23 Pac. 470, 472, 9 Mont. 243.

A day, in law, imports the entire day; but that a day in law is not divisible is a mere fiction, only observed for the purpose of justice, and never adhered to when it would work mischief. When rights attach from the orders of court, the event must be regarded, and not the name of that fraction of time called a day; and under a statute providing that the lands and tenements of a debtor shall be open for any judgment against the debtor from the first day of the term at which judgment is rendered, the word "term" is inclusive, and includes the first day, so that a debtor against whom a judgment is rendered in the fore part of the first day of the term cannot dispose of his land in the fore part of the day, so as to put it beyond the reach of his creditors. Follett v. Hall, 16 Ohio, 111, 112, 47 Am. Dec. 365.

Acts 1874-75, c. 24, § 2, providing that any railroad company allowing any freight received for shipment to remain unshipped for more than five days, in the absence of an agreement between the company and shipper fixing the time of shipment, shall forfeit a certain sum for each day the freight remains unshipped, means each whole day—a legal day being 24 hours; and hence the company is not liable until the full expiration of the sixth day after the delivery. Keeter v. Wilmington & W. R. Co., 86 N. C. 346, 347.

As from midnight to midnight.

"A day is the space of 24 hours, from midnight to midnight." State v. Brown, 22 Minn. 482, 483; Shaw v. Dodge, 5 N. H. 462, 463; Pulling v. People (N. Y.) 8 Barb. 384, 386; Schwab v. Mayforth (N. Y.) 1 City Ct. R. 177, 178.

The word "day," in common parlance, and as relating to the time within which statutes must be acted on by the Governor, means a civil day of 24 hours, beginning and ending at midnight. Opinion on Soldiers' Voting Bill, 53 N. H. 607, 610; Corwin v. Comptroller General, 6 S. C. (6 Rich.) 390, 396; People v. Hatch, 33 Ill. 9, 137.

A day is the period of time between any midnight and the midnight following. Pol. Code Cal. 1903, § 3259; Pol. Code Mont. 1895, § 3144; City of Eureka v. Diaz, 89 Cal. 467, 470, 26 Pac. 961, 962; E. M. Derby & Co. v. City of Modesto, 38 Pac. 900, 901, 902, 104 Cal. 515.

A day, in its natural sense, consists of 24 hours, or the space of time which elapses while the earth makes a complete revolution upon its axis. Bouv. Law Dict.; Abb. Law Dict.; Black, Law Dict. As used in Const. art. 41, requiring that, as soon as bills are signed by the Speaker of the House and President of the Senate, they shall be taken at once and on the same day to the Governor by the clerk of the House of Representatives or the Secretary of the Senate, etc., the day begins at 12 o'clock midnight, and extends through 24 hours to the next 12 o'clock midnight. State ex rel. State Pharmaceutical Ass'n v. Michel, 27 South. 565, 567, 52 La. Ann. 936, 49 L. R. A. 218, 78 Am. St. Rep. 364.

A day, as used in commercial law, relating to commercial paper, is a unit of time, and means the entire 24 hours, commencing at 12 o'clock p. m. and expiring with the next 12 o'clock p. m. Benson v. Adams, 69 Ind. 353, 354, 35 Am. Rep. 220.

Day, generally, in legal signification, includes the time elapsing from one midnight to the succeeding one, and, as used in a statute prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors to another on "election days" means from midnight preceding the opening of the polls until the succeeding midnight. Rose v. State, 33 S. E. 439, 441, 107 Ga. 697; Kane v. Commonwealth, 89 Pa. 522, 525, 33 Am. Dec. 787; Janks v. State, 15 S. W. 815, 816, 29 Tex. App. 233; Haines v. State, 7 Tex. App. 30, 33.

"Day" as used in Rev. St. 1874, c. 46, § 113, requiring the filing of the statement of an election contest within 30 days after the person whose election is contested is declared elected, means the ordinary day of 24 hours and does not expire till midnight. Zimmerman v. Cowan, 107 Ill. 681, 636, 47 Am. Rep. 476.

A day, according to the statutory division of time, consists of 24 hours, and commences and ends at midnight, and is an adoption of the natural day, as distinguished from the artificial day, from sunrise to sunset. Campbell v. International Life Ins. Soc. of London, 17 N. Y. Super. Ct. (4 Bosw.) 298, 310.

Under the term "day," as employed in the phrase "first day of the week," as used in the chapter relating to crimes against the person and against public decency and good morals, is included all the time from midnight to midnight. Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 6512; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 1962; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 6839; Pen. Code S. D. 1903, § 41.

The word "day" in a statute means the entire 24 hours, which commences at 12 o'clock p. m., and ends at 12 o'clock p. m., running from midnight to midnight. Sexton v. Goodwine (Ind. App.) 68 N. E. 929.

The only standard of time in the computation of a day, or the hours of a day, recognized by the law of Georgia, is the meridian of the sun; and a legal day begins and ends at midnight, the mean time between meridian and meridian, or 12 o'clock p. m. (post meridian); 12 hours after meridian. Henderson v. Reynolds, 84 Ga. 159, 162, 163, 10 S. E. 734, 7 L. E. A. 327.

When the Legislature used the term "day" in St. Dec. 24, 1799, prohibiting labor, business, or work of a secular nature, etc., "on the first day of the week, commonly called the 'Lord's Day,'" it is to be presumed that they intended it to be understood in its common acceptance; that is, a civil day, embracing 24 hours, and ending at midnight. Shaw v. Dodge, 5 N. H. 462, 465.

Portion of two days included.

"The word 'day' in law embraces the entire day; but that a day in law is not divisible is a mere fiction, only observed for the purpose of justice and never adhered to when it would work mischief." As used in a contract for the sale of a reaping machine, authorizing a test by using it for one day, it is to be understood with reference to the usage of farmers in working with such machines and is not to be limited to one calendar day, but may include a portion of two such days. Fuller v. Schroeder, 31 N. W. 109, 117, 20 Neb. 631.

An act prohibiting the sale of seed cotton "between the hours of sundown and sunrise of any day" means the time between sunset of one day and sunrise of the next succeeding day, and not a day beginning and ending at 12 o'clock night, though such is the legal significance of the term "day." State v. Padgett, 18 S. C. 317, 321.

An ordinance providing that it should be unlawful to keep any saloon, barroom, or dramshop open, or to sell or give away any intoxicating drinks therein, "between the hours of 11 o'clock p. m. and 5 o'clock a. m. of each and every day," means the period in every day between the hours of 11 p. m. and 5 a. m., and is the same period, whether designated as the period between 11 p. m. and 5 a. m., or between 5 a. m. and 11 p. m., of each and every day, and does not mean the period from 11 o'clock p. m. until 5 a. m. the following day. The term "day" has a well-known signification, and is defined by the Code to be the period of time between any midnight and the midnight following. City of Eureka v. Diaz, 26 Pac. 961, 962, 89 Cal. 467.

Sunday excluded.

Within the meaning of the rule that the prior indorser must have notice of the protest of a bill of exchange the next day, the next business day is meant. Davis v. Hanly, 12 Ark. (7 Eng.) 645, 650.

The Chicago city charter requires objections to special assessments to be filed at least one day prior to the meeting of the common council, at which the confirmation of the assessment will be applied for. Held, that the word "day", as there used, was used to express an intention that an entire day should intervene between the last day of publication of the notice of confirmation and the action of the council, and that that day should be a business day, and not Sunday, so that, where the last day of publication was on Saturday, and the council confirmed the assessment on the following Monday, the intervening Sunday being dies non juridicus, the parties interested had no opportunity, such as the law contemplated, to file their objections, and the assessment confirmed was invalid. Burton v. City of Chicago, 53 Ill. 87.

Sunday is not a day, within Sp. Laws 1871, c. 32, § 26, requiring publication of a notice of assessment for local improvements for a certain number of "days." Sewall v. City of St. Paul, 20 Minn. 511, 521 (Gil. 459, 467).

Act 1862 provides that the supervisors may do street work after notice of their intention to do so in the form of a resolution, describing the work and signed by their clerk, has been published for a period of 10 days. Held, that the 10 days mentioned in the act did not exclude Sundays by any exception, and hence Sundays should be counted in computing the time prescribed. Taylor v. Palmer, 31 Cal. 240, 241, 244; Miles v. McDermott, 31 Cal. 270, 271.

"Days," as used in Const. art. 4, § 5, providing that the Legislature shall not remain in session longer than 50 "days," means working days; and hence Sundays are to be excluded from the computation by which the end of the session is to be determined. Ex. parte Cowert, 9 South. 225, 226, 92 Ala. 84.

Acts 1874-75, c. 240, § 2, making it unlawful for any railroad company to allow any freight received for shipment to remain unshipped for more than five days, unless otherwise agreed between the company and the shipper, means five full running days, including Sunday, whenever it intervenes. Keeter v. Wilmington & W. R. Co., 86 N. C. 346, 347.

"Days," within a statute authorizing motion for new trial in four days, does not include Sunday. National Bank of the Metropolis v. Williams, 46 Mo. 17, 19.

Within a statute limiting time for appeals from justices' courts to six days, Sundays are included. Patchin v. Bonsack, 52 Mo. 431, 434.

The days within which appeals are allowed to be entered do not include Sundays. Neal v. Crew, 12 Ga. 93, 94.

Where a loading or unloading is required by charter party to be within a certain number of days generally, or so many working days, they do not include Sundays or custom house holidays, but days otherwise, where the words are running days. Field v. Chase (N. Y.) Lalor, Supp. 50, 52.

Rev. St. c. 24, art. 9, § 27, providing that the commissioners appointed to make a special assessment shall give notice of the time at which a final hearing will be had on such assessment roll by publishing the same at least "five successive days" in a daily newspaper, if one is published in the city or village, should be construed to include Monday as successive to Saturday; Sunday not being a judicial day. McChesney v. People, 34 N. E. 431, 145 Ill. 614.

Where Rev. St. 1892, c. 24, art. 9, § 28, requires the commissioners appointed to make a special assessment to cause at least 10 days' notice to be given by posting notices, in computing the time thereunder the Sundays intervening between the day of posting and the day of the hearing are to be counted as days. Gordon v. People, 39 N. E. 560, 561, 154 Ill. 664.

As twenty-four hours.

The whole time of the term of a court is not to be considered as one day. In England, for some purpose, it was so considered, but by our legislation natural days are to be regarded. In every instance in our laws where the word "day" is mentioned, a natural day is meant. Friar v. Ray, 5 Mo. 510, 512.

In an agreement by which plaintiff contracted to transport coal by a canal from W. to S., consigned to defendant, who was to have three full working or week days after the arrival of the boat in which to discharge the cargo, and to pay the master for any time, exclusive of Sundays, that the boat was detained after the expiration of said three days, the word "days" was held not to be restricted to working days of 10 hours each, but, in estimating the damages for detention, twenty-four hours was to be reckoned as a day. Wiles v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. (N. Y.) 4 Thomp. & C. 264, 266.

"Day," as used in the election law, providing that election officers for each day actually necessarily devoted by them to the discharge of their duties, shall receive $2 per day, will be held to mean the ordinary legal day of 24 hours, and not the ordinary working day. People v. Town Board of West Turin, 59 N. Y. Supp. 234, 235, 27 Misc. Rep. 470.

As used in 2 Rev. St. 1876, p. 162, providing that every action shall stand for issue and trial at the first term after it is commenced, when the summons has been served on the defendant 10 days or publication has been made for 30 days before the first day of the term; the phrase "10 days" has no peculiar or technical meaning in law but is used in its ordinary sense. The word "day" in its legal, as well as in its plain or ordinary and usual, sense, means a period of time consisting of 24 hours, and including the solar day and the night. Helphensteine v. Vincennes Nat. Bank, 65 Ind. 582, 589, 32 Am. Rep. 86.

In its ordinary sense a day is that space of time in which the earth makes one revolution on its axis. The astronomical day is from noon to noon. The civil day is from midnight to midnight. In the sense of the law, a day includes the whole 24 hours; the law generally rejecting all fractions of a day, in order to avoid disputes. 2 Bl. Comm. 141; Bouv. Law Dict. tit. "Day." The effect is to render the day a sort of indivisible point, so that any act done in the compass of it is no more referable to one than to any other portion of it; but the act and the day are co-extensive, and therefore the act cannot be said to be passed until the day is passed. Lester v. Garland, 15 Ves. 257. The word "day," when used in a contract or a statute, unless it is some way restricted, means the whole 24 hours. Miner v. Goodyear India Rubber Glove Mfg. Co., 26 Atl. 643, 62 Conn. 410.

"Days," as used in the Constitution, giving the Governor 10 days, exclusive of Sundays, in which to examine and consider an act of the Legislature before signing, the term days was used in its popular and legal sense, meaning that the Governor must have the full period of 10 days of 24 hours each, excluding Sundays, within which to perform his constitutional duty. Broughton v. Haywood, 61 N. C. 380, 383.

The promisor in a contract for the payment of money on a designated day has the whole of that day in which to pay it, and no cause of action arises until it has fully expired, even on demand made on that day. Knowlton v. Tilton, 38 N. H. 257, 263 (citing Webb v. Fairman, 3 Mees & W. 474).

As working day.

In a contract that a company would construct a factory capable of manufacturing a certain number of cans per day, the word "day" will be construed to mean the ordinary working day, and not twenty-four hours. Fay & Egan Co. v. Brown, 71 N. W. 895, 897, 96 Wis. 434.

Code, § 268, providing that the compensation of porters in the Senate shall be at the rate of $4 per day, means whatever period of the 24 hours the legislators choose to remain in session. Robinson v. Dunn, 19 Pac. 878, 77 Cal. 473, 11 Am. St. Rep. 297.

The term "day," as used in a contract providing for a payment of so much a day, means a working day. McClusky v. Klosterman, 25 Pac. 366, 370, 20 Or. 108, 10 L. R. A. 785.

The term "day," in a contract of employment, means 10 hours' work, where it was the universal usage in the business in which the employé was employed to call 10 hours' labor a day's work. Hinton v. Locke (N. Y.) 5 Hill, 437, 439.

Ordinarily day is the space of time which elapses while the earth makes a complete revolution on its axis, but artificially it is the time between the rising and setting of the sun. And in Code, § 3825, providing that the commissioners of insanity shall be allowed at the rate of $3 per day each, for the time actually employed in the duties of their office, the term is not to be so construed, and the statute entitles the commissioners to full compensation whenever they perform services on a given day, regardless of the number of hours spent in such employment. White v. Dallas County, 54 N. W. 368, 369, 87 Iowa, 563.

Where a statute provides that a county superintendent of schools shall receive $5 per day for the time necessarily spent in the discharge of his duties, he is entitled to this daily compensation for each day on which it becomes necessary for him to perform any substantial official service, if he does perform the same, regardless of the time occupied in its performance, and the time so spent constitutes a day's service for the superintendent. Smith v. Jefferson County Com'rs, 13 Pac. 917, 920, 10 Colo. 17.

In computation of time.

The date of the act from which future time is to be ascertained is to be excluded from a computation, not only in regard to contracts, liens, and other instruments, but to statutes and the proceedings under them. Weeks v. Hull, 19 Conn. 376, 380, 50 Am. Dec. 249.

Code, § 3730, providing that the adverse party shall have five days' notice of the day a commission to take testimony will issue, does not mean five entire days' notice; but the mode of computing the time is to exclude the first and include the last day the commission is to issue. Bonney v. Cocke, 16 N. W. 139, 61 Iowa, 303.

A statute requiring creditors in insolvency proceedings to file their plea within 20 days after the debtor has filed his declaration means 20 days thereafter, computed by either excluding one day and including the other, or by including such first day and excluding the other. State v. Jackson, 4 N. J. Law (1 Southard) 323, 324.

A deed of trust requiring 30 days' notice of the sale of the property to be given means 30 days computed by excluding the day of publication and including the day of sale. Magnusson v. Williams, 111 Ill. 450, 454.

2 Gav. & H. St. p. 593, § 64, requiring an appeal to be taken from the justice of the peace within 30 days from the rendition of the judgment, means 30 days thereafter, computed by excluding the day of the rendition of the judgment and including the day of taking the appeal. Noble v. Murphy, 27 Ind. 502.

In computing the time of delivering the list of the jury, the date of the delivery and the date of trial must both be excluded, where the statute provides that the person to be tried shall have two entire days to pass upon the list. State v. McLendon (Ala.) 1 Stew. 195, 197.

In computing time within which an act is to be done, the first day should be excluded and the last day included. Hahn v. Dierkes, 37 Mo. 574.

A contract to be performed in so many days, without saying more, excludes the day of the date of the contract from the computation. Blake v. Crowninshield, 9 N. H. 304, 307.

Acts 1874-75, c. 240, § 2, making it unlawful for any railroad company to allow freight to remain unshipped for more than "five days," unless otherwise agreed, means five full running days, exclusive of the day of delivery and the day of shipment; the law not taking notice of the fractions of a day. Branch v. Wilmington & W. R. Co., 88 N. C. 570, 572.

A calendar day includes the time from midnight to midnight. Sunday, or any day of the week specifically mentioned, means a calendar day. A number of days specified as a period from a certain day within which, or after or before which, an act is authorized or required to be done, means such number of calendar days, exclusive of the calendar day from which the reckoning is made. Sunday or a public holiday, other than a half holiday, must be excluded from the reckoning, if it is the last day of any such period, or if it is an intervening day of any such period of two days. In computing any specified number of days, weeks, or months from a specified event, the day upon which the event happens is deemed the day from which the reckoning is made. The day from which any specified number of days, weeks, or months of time is reckoned shall be excluded in making the reckoning. Laws N. Y. 1892, c. 677, § 27.

DAY BY DAY.

A charter party providing for demurrage for "every day, day by day," is to be construed as referring to running days, and not working days, and all days are to be counted, including rainy days, Sundays, and other holidays. The Oluf (U. S.) 19 Fed. 459.

DAY CERTAIN.

The phrase "on a day certain," as used in St. 6 & 7 Vict. c. 20, § 16, ordering that every mandamus shall be tested and made returnable on a day certain before the queen, etc., means a day in term. Reg. v. Conyers, 8 Q. B. 981, 991.

DAY IN COURT.

The term "day in court" means the day on which a cause is reached for trial in pursuance of the forms and methods prescribed by law. It does not mean any day during a series of years, as there must necessarily be some end to every litigation. Ketchum v. Breed, 26 N. W. 271, 274, 66 Wis. 85.

The term "day in court," in the rule of the law that no one shall be personally bound until he has had his day in court, means until he has been duly cited to appear and has been afforded an opportunity to be heard. Ferry v. Milltimore Elastic Steel Car Wheel Co., 45 Atl. 1085, 1036, 71 Vt. 457, 76 Am. St. Rep. 787.

DAY LABORER.

"A day laborer is one who performs day labor or performs labor by the day." Groves v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co., 57 Mo. 304, 307.

"A day laborer is one whose engagement to labor is but a day long. At the end of each day both he and his employer are free." The term is used in such sense in Act Ga. 1845, providing that all day laborers shall be exempt from a process and liability of garnishment on their daily, weekly, or monthly wages, whether in the hands of employers or others. Caraker v. Matthews, 25 Ga. 571, 576.

Commercial traveler.

A commercial traveler, whose business it is to travel and sell goods for his employer, though employed and paid for his services by the day, is not a day laborer, within Code Ga. § 3554, exempting from garnishment the wages of a day laborer. Briscoe v. Montgomery, 20 S. E. 40, 41, 93 Ga. 602, 44 Am. St. Rep. 192.

Conductor.

A conductor of a passenger or freight train, who is not employed for the purpose of doing manual labor, but whose duty it is to have general control and superintendence of the train and its running and management, and supervision of the passengers and baggage, is not "a journeyman, mechanic, or a day laborer," within Code, § 3554, exempting from garnishment the wages of a journeyman, mechanic, or day laborer. Miller v. Dugas, 77 Ga. 386, 388, 4 Am. St. Rep. 90.

Engineer.

Within the meaning of Code, § 3554, which declares that all journeymen, mechanics, and day laborers shall be exempt from the process and liabilities of garnishment, etc., includes a locomotive engineer; hence such engineer would be within the protection of the statute. Sanner v. Shivers, 76 Ga. 335, 336.

Superintendent of factory.

Within Code, § 3554, which exempts from liability and the process of garnishment the wages of "journeymen, mechanics, and day laborers," the boss or director of an entire department of an extensive factory, who employs and discharges the hands that work under him, but does no manual labor, merely directing the work of the operatives under him, is not a day laborer, though the words have been construed to include the overseer of a plantation, who not only directed the operations of the hands employed, but labored with them, and also clerks employed in stores. Kyle v. Montgomery, 73 Ga. 337, 343.

DAYLIGHT.

Daylight, in the law relating to burglary, means the light caused by the coming or rising sun. People v. Gibson, 25 N. W. 316, 317, 58 Mich. 368.

The term "daylight," in an insurance policy providing that kerosene for lights shall be drawn by daylight only, does not denote daytime as opposed to nighttime, but is intended to prevent the use of any artificial light, from which the oil might catch fire. Gunther v. Liverpool, L. & G. Ins. Co., 10 Sup. Ct. 448, 449, 134 U. S. 110, 33 L. Ed. 557.

DAY OF DATE.

In construing a deed requiring certain memorials to be enrolled within 20 days of the execution, and to contain the day the deed bears date, Lord Eldon says: "The 'day of the date' of a deed is, I apprehend, the date of the execution; and there would be great singularity in the law if these words, 'the date of the execution' and 'the day the deed bears date,' have not the same meaning." Underhill v. Horwood, 10 Ves. 209, 228.

DAY OF SALE.

Date of sale, see, also, "Date."

"Day of sale," as used in a statute limiting an action for the recovery of real property sold for taxes to five years from the day of sale, will not be construed to mean the day on which the property was struck off by the treasurer to the bidder, but the day of the completion of the sale by the delivery and recording of the tax deed. Eldridge v. Kuehl, 27 Iowa, 160, 173, 175.

The words "day of sale," in Act April 8, 1869, § 138, fixing a period of limitation for actions to test the validity of a tax sale, which begins to run from the "day of the sale," means the day on which the property is stricken off by the officer making the sales. In Wain v. Shearman (Pa.) 8 Serg. & R. 357, 11 Am. Dec. 624, and in Eldridge v. Kuehl, 27 Iowa, 160, similar statutes were construed to mean the completed sale, when the purchaser received his deed. But in Mitchell v. Etter, 22 Ark. 178, where the five-year limitation statute in regard to judicial and tax sales was under discussion, such construction was declared to be at war with both the letter and spirit of the enactment. Radcliffe v. Scruggs, 46 Ark. 96, 108.

DAY OF TRIAL.

In Code Proc. § 427, regulating notice, etc., "day of trial" means the day fixed by law for the commencement of the term. Green v. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co., 6 S. C. (6 Rich.) 342, 344.

DAY WORKMAN.

Within the meaning of Laws 1898, c. 186, providing that laborers and day workmen employed by the city of New York shall not be subject to competitive examination, includes a stream cleaner, whose duty requires him to keep clean the water running in streams, removing rubbish and other injurious materials therefrom, and to prevent pollution thereof. People v. Dalton, 68 N. Y. Supp. 253, 259, 49 App. Div. 71.

DAY'S LABOR.

A day's labor of a laborer does not include the team which he drives. In a large sense the person whose teams are employed for another performs labor with them, whether he works himself or not; but in a stricter sense a day's labor of a man is that which he performs himself. This may include any mere implement of toll without which labor cannot be performed, but not the use of horse, any more than of steam, power. Atcherson v. Troy & B. R. Co. (N. Y.) 6 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 329, 337.

DAYS OF GRACE.

Days of grace are three days allowed to the maker or acceptor of a bill, draft, or note in which to make payment after the expiration of the time expressed in the paper. Perkins v. Franklin Bank, 38 Mass. (21 Pick.) 483, 485; Bell v. First Nat. Bank, 6 Sup. Ct. 105, 109, 115 U. S. 373, 29 L. Ed. 409 (quoting Chief Justice Shaw in Perkins v. Franklin Bank, 38 Mass. [21 Pick.] 483); Mechanics' Bank of Baltimore v. Merchants' Bank of Boston, 47 Mass. (6 Metc.) 13, 22; Feris v. Saxton, 4 N. J. Law (1 Southard) 1, 19.

Days of grace are a certain number of days allowed the maker or acceptor of a bill, draft, or note before he can be sued. Originally they were called days of grace because they were gratuitous, depending altogether on the will of the holder, and could not be claimed as a matter of right by the person bound to pay; and, although they still retain the name of grace, yet the custom of merchants recognized by law has long since reduced them to certainty, and given the acceptor or maker a title to claim them as a matter of right. Thomas v. Shoemaker (Pa.) 6 Watts & S. 179, 182.

The law merchant allowed three days after the date on which a note became payable in which it might be paid. By custom, however, these days became universally recognized, and, although still termed "days of grace," they are now considered, wherever the law merchant prevails, as entering into the constitution of every bill of exchange and negotiable note, both in England and the United States, and form so completely a part of it that the instrument is not due in fact or in law until the day of grace. Fox v. Bank of Kansas City, 1 Pac. 789, 791, 30 Kan. 441; Blacker v. Ryan, 65 Mo. App. 230, 241.

The usage of making the demand of payment of a promissory note or bill of exchange on the third day of grace has become so general that courts of justice will notice it ex officio, and, in the absence of any proof to the contrary, will presume that such was the understanding of all parties to the note when they put their names upon it. The allowance of any days of grace is in derogation of the common-law rule applicable to other contracts. They are emphatically the mere creatures of usage, varying in different countries to suit the views and convenience of men in business, originally gratuitous and not binding on the holder. When, therefore, the allowance of only three days of grace is said to be the law of the contract by bills of exchange and promissory notes, nothing more can be intended than that custom has so long sanctioned this rule that all dealers in paper of this description are understood to govern themselves by it. The law of the contract, properly speaking, is to pay when due, and that time is to be ascertained either from the contract per se, or that taken in connection with some known custom which the parties are presumed to have tacitly consented should be made a part of the contract; and where it is established that the custom of all the banks in Washington and Georgetown, from their first institution, had been to demand payment of notes due them on the fourth day after the time limited therein, and that this custom was known and well understood by an indorser of a note, such custom of allowing four days of grace is binding upon the parties. Renner v. Bank of Columbia, 22 U. S. (9 Wheat.) 531, 534, 536, 6 L. Ed. 166.

DAYS' WORK.

The term "days' work," as used in the constitution of an association of dredgers for the purpose of designating and maintaining a uniform scale of prices for dredging in New York Harbor and vicinity, to equitably distribute work, each member to be entitled to a certain percentage of the work done, figured on the basis of "days' work," means days actually worked by the machines of the several contractors; the capacity of the machines being, roughly speaking, gauged by their power. Potter v. Morris & Cummings Dredging Co., 46 Atl. 537, 59 N. J. Eq. 422.

Act Cong. June 25, 1868 (15 Stat. 77), declaring "that eight hours shall constitute a day's work for all laborers, workmen, and mechanics now employed or who may hereafter be employed by or on behalf of the government of the United States," does not provide that the employer and the laborer may not agree with each other as to what time should constitute a day's work. There are some branches of labor connected with furnaces, steam, and gasworks where the labor and exposure of 8 hours a day would soon exhaust the strength of a laborer and render him permanently an invalid. The government officer is not prohibited from knowing these facts, nor from agreeing, when it is proper, that a less number of hours than 8 shall be accepted as a day's work. Nor does the statute intend that, where out of doors labor in the long days of summer may be offered for 12 hours at a uniform price, the officer may not so contract with the consenting laborer. The court said: "We regard the statute chiefly as in the nature of a direction from the principal to his agent that eight hours is deemed to be a proper length of time for a day's labor, and that his contracts shall be based upon that theory. It is a matter between the principal and his agent, in which a third party has no interest. We are of the opinion, therefore, that contracts fixing or giving a different length of time as a day's work are legal and binding upon the parties making them"—and held that, where a laborer in the habit of working for the government 12 hours a day at $2.50 a day is informed by the proper authority that if he remains in the service at that compensation he must continue to work 12 hours a day, and he does so continue to work accordingly, he cannot afterwards recover for the additional time over 8 hours as a day's labor. United States v. Martin, 94 U. S. 400, 403, 404, 24 L. Ed. 128.

DAYTIME.

Daytime is the period between sunrise and sunset. Pol. Code Mont. 1895, § 3145; Pol. Code Cal. 1903, § 3260.

By the term "daytime," as used in the chapter defining and punishing burglary, is meant any time of the 24 hours from 30 minutes before sunrise to 30 minutes after sunset. Pen. Code Tex. 1895, art. 844.

Within St. 1874, c. 41, § 9, providing that prisoners having given bond are to have the liberty of the yard within the prison in the daytime, "daytime" has always been construed to mean that portion of the 24 hours in which a man's person and countenance are distinguishable. Trull v. Wilson, 9 Mass. 154.

A statute punishing the offense of breaking into a dwelling house in the daytime, no person being therein, requires proof that the breaking took place at a time of the day when there was sufficient daylight to distinguish a person's features. Rex v. Tandy, 1 Car. & P. 297.

Daytime means the time from the rising to the setting of the sun, and that portion of the time after the setting of the sun or before its rising during which there is sufficient natural light, other than moonlight, so that the countenance of a man may be distinguished. Linnen v. Banfield, 114 Mich. 93, 98, 72 N. W. 1, 2.

DE BONIS NON.

See "Administrator de Bonis Non."

DE BONIS NON CUM TESTAMENTO ANNE XO.

See "Administrator de Bonis Non cum Testamento Anne xo."

DE COMMUNICATO CAPIENDO.

See "Writ de Communicato Capiendo."

DE CORPORE COMITATUS.

The phrase "de corpore comitatus" means from the body of the county; of the county; of the vicinage, originally, but as it appears in English statutes and in American laws and constitutions it means no more, as applied to jurors, than that they must come from some part of the county in which the action is laid, or where the crime is charged to have been committed. State v. Kemp, 34 Minn. 61, 63, 24 N. W. 349.

DE FACTO.

"De facto" means in law, as well as elsewhere, of fact; from, arising out of, or founded in fact; in deed; in point of fact; actually; really. McCahon v. Leavenworth County Com'rs, 8 Kan. 437, 442 (citing Burr. Law Dict.).

DE FACTO ADMINISTRATOR.

Any recognition by the probate court cannot make one an administrator de facto. No person can fill that position except after due appointment and qualification. Pryor v. Downey, 50 Cal. 388, 399, 19 Am. Rep. 656.

DE FACTO BOARD OF DIRECTORS.

Where seven persons, claiming to be directors of a corporation, met at a place other than that designated in the by-laws, and elected one of their number president, and it was afterwards decided that the election at which these directors were elected was illegal, but four of them, including the one elected president, were still directors by virtue of a previous valid election, but these alleged directors at the time they elected the president were not in possession of the company's office or records or seal or property, and had never done any official act prior to said meeting, it was held that such persons did not constitute a de facto board of directors. Waterman v. Chicago & I. R. Co., 29 N. E. 689, 691, 139 Ill. 658, 15 L. R. A. 418, 32 Am. St. Rep. 228.

DE FACTO CONTRACT OF SALE.

A de facto contract of sale is one which has purported to pass the property from the owner to another, and where the owner of a chattel parts with that chattel to another, on a de facto contract, a purchaser from that other bona fide will obtain an indefeasible title. Farmers' & Mechanics' Nat. Bank v. Logan, 74 N. Y. 568, 575.

A contract of sale of goods to one who fraudulently personated and represented himself to be another—the goods being sold to such purchaser in reliance upon such representations by the seller, who believed that the purchaser was the person he represented himself to be—constitutes a de facto contract, and transfers the title in the goods delivered under such contract to such purchaser, so that the one purchasing from him will acquire a good title. Edmunds v. Merchants' Dispatch Transp. Co., 135 Mass. 283, 284.

DE FACTO CORPORATION.

A de facto corporation is one existing under color of law. Foster v. Hara, 62 S. W. 541, 543, 26 Tex. Civ. App. 177.

A de facto corporation is a set of men claiming to be a legally incorporated company under an act of the Legislature, exercising all the powers and functions of a corporation, but without lawful authority in fact so to do. Attorney General v. Stevens, 1 N. J. Eq. (Saxt.) 369, 378, 22 Am. Dec. 528.

Where there has been a good-faith effort to organize a corporation under a statute authorizing such incorporation, and corporate functions have been assumed and exercised, the organization becomes a de facto corporation. Huntington Mfg. Co. v. Schofield, 62 N. E. 106, 107, 28 Ind. App. 95.

A de facto corporation is one that exists under color of law. The mere fact that a town exercised jurisdiction outside of the limits of the territory incorporated does not render it a de facto corporation as to such territory. Foster v. Hara, 62 S. W. 541, 543, 26 Tex. Civ. App. 177.

There can be no de facto corporation unless the statute authorizes the formation of a de jure corporation. State v. Stevens (S. D.) 92 N. W. 420, 421.

In order to be a de facto corporation, there must be a right under the law to incorporate, and an attempt to comply with the law, but a failure to comply with some requirement thereof. McLeary v. Dawson, 87 Tex. 524, 538, 29 S. W. 1044. So, where articles of incorporation alleging that two of the incorporators are residents of the city are regularly filed in the office of the Secretary of State as required by law, and a certificate issued by the Secretary, and it afterwards appears that there were not two citizens of the state among the incorporators, as required by law, the corporation is de facto. American Salt Co. v. Heidenheimer, 15 S. W. 1038, 1039, 80 Tex. 344, 26 Am. St. Rep. 743.

Where a statute exists under which parties may lawfully incorporate, and an attempt is made to organize thereunder, and especially where the organization has assumed and for a long time has exercised all the corporate powers which the statute would have conferred, it has acquired a colorable right to exist, though it may be discovered that the incorporation was for some reason defective. It is a corporation de facto, and must be so regarded in a collateral proceeding. Cedar Rapids Water Co. v. City of Cedar Rapids, 91 N. W. 1081, 1088, 118 Iowa, 234.

A de facto corporation is one where the proceedings for its organization are irregular or defective, when by regularity of proceedings to incorporate it might be one de jure. Thus, where there was no law authorizing de jure municipal corporations, a de facto corporation could not exist. City of Guthrie v. Wylie, 55 Pac. 103, 106, 6 Okl. 61.

A de facto corporation exists where there is a law authorizing the creation of a corporation, and attempt to organize a corporation pursuant to it, and user as a corporation under such attempted organization. Color of apparent organization under some charter or enabling act does not mean that there should have been a full compliance with what the law requires to be done, nor a substantial compliance. The mere fact that there is a law under which a corporation might be created, and that the parties have agreed among themselves to act and have acted as a corporation, is not sufficient to constitute them a corporation de facto. There must at least be a colorable compliance with a law under which a corporation de jure might be lawfully created by a substantial compliance with such law, and a user as a corporation under such attempted organization. Johnson v. Okerstrom, 73 N. W. 147, 149, 70 Minn. 303.

The expression "de facto corporation" is generally used to denote associations exercising corporate powers under color of more or less legal organization. Where there cannot be a corporation de jure, there cannot be one de facto. In order to constitute a corporation de facto, it is necessary that there should be either a charter or a law under which such a corporation could exist, with the powers it assumes to exercise, and a colorable compliance with the requirements of the charter of the law, and the user of the rights claimed under the same. Brown v. Atlanta Ry. & Power Co., 39 S. E. 71, 73, 113 Ga. 462.

To constitute a de facto corporation, there are three requisites: (1) A charter or general law under which such a corporation as it purports to be might lawfully be organized; (2) an attempt to organize thereunder; and (3) the actual user of the corporate franchise. Hence a de facto corporation was constituted by a bona fide attempt to organize an irrigation district under the California irrigation act of March 7, 1887, providing for the creation of such districts as public municipal corporations, accompanied by an actual user of the corporate franchise. Tulare Irrigation District v. Shepard, 22 Sup. Ct. 531, 536, 185 U. S. 1, 46 L. Ed. 773.

A corporation de facto exists when, from irregularity or defect in the organization or constitution, or from some omission to comply with the conditions precedent, a corporation de jure is not created, but there has been a colorable compliance with the requirements of some law under which an association might be lawfully incorporated for the purposes and powers assumed, and a user of the rights claimed to be conferred by the law, when there is an organization with color of law, and the exercise of corporate franchises. Owensboro Wagon Co. v. Bliss, 31 South. 81, 132 Ala. 253, 90 Am. St. Rep. 907; Snider's Sons Co. v. Troy, 8 South. 658, 659, 91 Ala. 224, 11 L. R. A. 575, 24 Am. St. Rep. 887; Stout v. Zulick, 48 N. J. Law (19 Vroom) 599, 601, 7 Atl. 362; McTighe v. Macon Const. Co., 21 S. E. 701, 705, 94 Ga. 306, 32 L. R. A. 208, 47 Am. St. Rep. 153.

A corporation de facto is an apparent corporate organization, asserted to be a corporation by its members, and actually acting as such, but lacking the creative fiat of the law. In Tayl. Priv. Corp. 145, it is said that a de facto corporation may exist when a body of men are acting as a corporation under color of apparent organization, in pursuance of some charter or enabling act. Their organization may be imperfect, so that upon a quo warranto they could not show a sufficient compliance with the law to justify the exercise of corporate powers; but, as to parties dealing with them and as to each other, they are estopped to deny that they are what they hold themselves out to be. In a recent case in Minnesota (Finnegan v. Noerenberg, 53 N. W. 1150, 52 Minn. 239, 18 L. R. A. 778, 38 Am. St. Rep. 552) it was held that a de facto corporation exists when these three things concur, viz., a law under which the alleged corporation might be created, an attempt to organize under the law, and assumption and exercise of corporate powers under such attempted organization. In Methodist Episcopal Union Church v. Pickett, 19 N. Y. 482, only two things were held necessary, viz., the existence of a charter or law under which a corporation with the powers assumed might be lawfully created, and a user by the party to the suit of the right claimed to be conferred by such a charter or law. In re Gibbs' Estate, 27 Atl. 383, 384, 157 Pa. 59, 22 L. R. A. 276.

A de facto corporation is constituted by a user of corporate franchises, and by acts in the nature of corporate proceedings under the color of corporate organization, Childs v. Smith (N. Y.) 55 Barb. 45, 56; or where proceedings have been taken in professed compliance with some law authorizing the formation of a corporation, and there are acts of subsequent user, Methodist Episcopal Union Church v. Pickett, 19 N. Y. 482; or where there is a user of corporate franchises under color of an act authorizing the incorporation, Bradley Fertilizer Co. v. South Pub. Co., 23 N. Y. Supp. 675, 676, 4 Misc. Rep. 172 (citing Bank of Toledo v. International Bank, 21 N. Y. 542).

In cases of corporations de facto there must have been at least an attempt made to organize under some law, and if no such attempt has been made, and yet the parties assume to act as if there had been, the concern is not a de facto corporation, and the parties connected with it are liable as copartners. Bradley Fertilizer Co. v. South Pub. Co., 23 N. Y. Supp. 675, 676.

A de facto corporation is a corporation existing from the fact of its acting as such, though not in law a corporation. An association may not be able to justify itself when called on by the state to show by what authority it presumes to be and act as a corporation, but it may be so far a corporation that for reasons of public policy no one but the state will be permitted to question the lawfulness of its organization. Finnegan v. Noerenberg, 53 N. W. 1150, 1151, 52 Minn. 239, 18 L. R. A. 778, 38 Am. St. Rep. 552.

Where an association in fact existed as a corporation, acquiring property in that capacity, exercising powers and transacting business essential to accomplish the object and purpose of its creation, as expressed in the declaration intended as the articles of incorporation, and where it had the reputation of being a corporation, it was a corporation de facto. Central Agricultural & Mechanical Ass'n v. Alabama Gold Life Ins. Co., 70 Ala. 120, 132, 133.

When parties associate themselves together for the purpose of organizing a corporation under some statute, and proceed in good faith to take all the steps professed necessary to complete such incorporation, and, on the faith of their actions and the law, engage in business as a corporation, there is a corporation de facto; and only the state can inquire, and that in a direct proceeding, whether the corporation be one de jure. Pape v. Capitol Bank, 20 Kan. 440, 445, 27 Am. Rep. 183.

Corporations may exist either de jure or de facto. If of the latter character, they are under the protection of the same law and are governed by the same legal principles as those of the former, so long as the state acquiesces in their existence and they exercise corporate functions. Snider's Sons Co. v. Troy, 91 Ala. 224, 8 South. 658, 11 L. R. A. 515, 24 Am. St. Rep. 887.

DE FACTO COURT.

A de facto court is a court that has been established by an act of Legislature apparently valid, which has gone into operation, and the office is filled and authority as a court exercised under the statute. Burt v. Winona & St. P. R. Co., 18 N. W. 285, 287, 31 Minn. 472.

A de facto Court of Appeals cannot exist under a written Constitution which ordains one Supreme Court, and defines the qualifications and duties of its judges, and prescribes the mode of appointing them. Accordingly, where a Legislature attempted to abolish the constitutional Court of Appeals, and create in its stead a new court, such act did not create a de facto Court of Appeals, and there being no pretense that those assuming to act as such were added to the judges of the constitutional Court of Appeals, or were their successors, they were not de facto officers, even granting that there might be a de facto judge of the Court of Appeals. Frame v. Trebble, 24 Ky. (1 J. J. Marsh.) 205, 206.

DE FACTO DIRECTOR.

Those who usurp the office of directors and exercise the functions of the board of directors under color of election or appointment in itself not legal become directors de facto; and the official acts of such board are valid, in reference to rights which innocent third parties or strangers to the corporation may thereby acquire. Hulings v. Hulings Lumber Co., 18 S. E. 620, 624, 38 W. Va. 351.

DE FACTO DOMICILE.

In the French law the term "domicile," in the full sense of that term as there used, means something in the nature of nationality or citizenship, and can only be obtained by an authorization by a decree. French Civ. Code, art. 13. In the absence of such decree a foreigner resident in France remains an alien for some purposes, other than political, no matter how permanent the character of his establishment, or how fixed his intention of remaining. There is, however, a sort of domicile, recognized and called a "domicile de facto," which is substantially identical with our domicile. A person residing in France, though not a citizen, and never having taken any step to become a citizen, if his residence has been with intent to make France his home and fixed abiding place, is domiciled there de facto, and certain legal results follow. Among these is that after his decease the administration of his estate found in France is submitted to the tribunals of the place of his principal establishment in France, and the validity of his will, considered as to its form and manner of execution, is to be there determined. The French law does not impose any condition of nationality or residence in order that a will may be valid. In re Cruger's Will, 73 N. Y. Supp. 812, 815, 36 Misc. Rep. 477.

DE FACTO GOVERNMENT.

A government de facto, in the proper legal sense, is the government that unlawfully gets the possession and control of the rightful legal government, and maintains itself there by force and arms against the will of the rightful legal government, and claims to exercise the powers thereof. Chisholm v. Coleman, 43 Ala. 204, 213, 94 Am. Dec. 677.

A de facto government is any organized government established for the time over a considerable territory in exclusion of the regular government. A de facto government of this sort is not distinguishable in particular from other unlawful combinations. It is distinguishable in fact mainly by power and in territorial control, and by the policy usually adopted in relation to it by the national government. With respect to such a government, it is clear that none of its acts in hostility to the regular government can be recognized as lawful, yet it is equally clear that transactions between individuals which would be legal and binding under orduary circumstances cannot be pronounced illegal and of no obligation because done in conformity with laws enacted or directions given by the usurping power. Thomas v. Taylor, 42 Miss. 651, 704, 2 Am. Rep. 625.

"There is a description of government called by publicists a 'government de facto,' but which might be perhaps more aptly denominated a 'government of paramount force.' Its distinguishing characteristics are, first, that its existence is maintained by active military power within the territories and against the rightful authority of an established and lawful government; and, second, that while it exists it must necessarily be obeyed in civil matters by private citizens, who, by acts of obedience rendered in submission to such force, do not become responsible as wrongdoers for those acts, though not warranted by the laws of the rightful government. Actual governments of this sort are established over districts differing greatly in extent and conditions. They are usually administered directly by military authority, but they may be administered also by civil authority, supported more or less directly by military force. One example of this sort of government is found in the case of Castine, in Maine, reduced to British possession during the War of 1812. From the 1st of September, 1814, to the ratification of the treaty of peace, in 1815, according to the judgment of this court in United States v. Rice, 17 U. S. (4 Wheat.) 253, 4 L. Ed. 562, the British government exercised all civil and military authority over the place. The authority of the United States was extinguished, and the laws of the United States could no longer be rightfully enforced there. By the surrender the inhabitants passed under a temporary allegiance to the British government, and were bound by such laws, and such only, as it chose to recognize and impose. It is not to be inferred from this that the obligations of the people of Castine as citizens of the United States were abrogated. They were suspended merely by the presence, and only during the presence, of the paramount force. A like example is found in the case of Tampico, occupied during the war with Mexico by the troops of the United States. It was determined by this court in Fleming v. Page, 50 U. S. (9 How.) 614, 13 L. Ed. 276, that, although Tampico did not become a port of the United States in consequence of that occupation, still, having come, together with the whole state of Tamaulipas, of which it was part, into the exclusive possession of the national forces, it must be regarded and respected by other nations as the territory of the United States." Thorington v. Smith, 75 U. S. (8 Wall.) 1, 9, 19 L. Ed. 361.

A government de facto arises only where the established government has been subverted by successful rebellion, and the new government exercises undisputed sway for the time being over the entire country, or where the people of any portion of a country, subject to the same government, throw over their allegiance to that government, and establish one of their own, and show not only that they have established a government, but also their ability to maintain it. This principle is founded on reason and the fitness of things, and it is therefore a rule of international law. The recognition of the government of a revolted state or province by a neutral power is casus belli for the sovereign claiming dominion over the revolted country, if such recognition precedes the exhibition by the newly formed government of its ability to maintain its independence. Where recognitions of revolted states have occurred without this manifestation of the ability to sustain their new condition, they have been simply interventions with the intention of war. Smith v. Stewart, 21 La. Ann. 67, 71, 99 Am. Dec. 709.

De facto governments are of two kinds. One of them is such as exists after it has expelled the regularly constituted authorities and established its own functionaries in their places, so as to represent in fact the sovereignty of the nation. Such was the government of England under the Commonwealth. As a rule, the rights acquired under such a government are respected after the restoration of the authorities which were expelled. The other kind of de facto government is such as exists where a portion of the inhabitants of a country have separated themselves from the parent state and established an independent government. If it succeeds, the validity of its acts from the commencement of its existence are upheld as those of an independent nation. If it fails, its acts are of no effect. Such was the case of the state governments under the old Confederation on their separation from the British crown. Under this principle, an enactment of the Confederacy cannot have its acts upheld as an act of a government de facto. The mere fact that it temporarily expelled the authorities of the United States from the territory over which it forcibly exercised a usurped dominion did not establish it as a de facto government of the first class, since the United States immediately resorted to like force, and continued to use it until their authority was re-established. Williams v. Bruffy, 96 U. S. 176, 185, 24 L. Ed. 716.

The term "de facto," as descriptive of a government, has no fixed and definite sense. It is perhaps more correctly used as signifying a government completely, though only temporarily, established in the place of the lawful or regular government, occupying its capital and exercising its power. The term, however, is often used, and perhaps more frequently, in a sense less precise, as signifying any organized government established for the time over a considerable territory in exclusion of the regular government. A de facto government of this sort is not distinguishable in principle from other unlawful combinations. It is distinguishable in fact mainly by power and in territorial control, and by the policy usually adopted in relation to it by the national government. In the more correct sense of the word, it is held that the Confederate government was never a de facto government in any such sense that its acts are entitled to judicial recognition as valid. Keppel v. Petersburg R. Co., 14 Fed. Cas. 357, 370.

DE FACTO JUDGE.

Where the conditions on which a temporary judge might have been appointed existed, and one was duly elected, qualified, and took possession of the office, but without filing the official oath required, he was a de facto judge, and the proceedings of the court could not afterwards be questioned collaterally. State v. Miller, 20 S. W. 243, 244, 111 Mo. 542.

Where a person was appointed by the governor as district judge under a statute providing for the redistricting of the state, and for the appointment of an additional judge to hold office until the next general election, and for more than a year thereafter the appointee officiated as judge, and still acts as such in the locality assigned to him with the acquiescence of the people, the law originally creating the office of district judge being of unquestioned validity, he is a judge de facto, though the statute under which he was appointed be unconstitutional and void. Walcott v. Wells, 24 Pac. 367, 370, 371, 21 Nev. 47, 9 L. R. A. 313, 37 Am. St. Rep. 478. Where, on account of the illness of the incumbent, a person has been appointed an acting county judge by the commissioners of a county, qualifies for the position, and assumes the duties of the office, and is actually engaged in the discharge of the functions of the office, acquiesced in by the public during all of the time, he is a de facto judge. Dredla v. Baache, 83 N. W. 916, 918, 60 Neb. 655.

In order to be a de facto judge, there must be a regularly constituted office, and a vacancy therein, before one appointed or elected to fill such office shall be denominated a de facto officer. Caldwell v. Barrett (Ark.) 74 S. W. 748, 750.

DE FACTO OFFICE.

Under a written constitution creating and defining the various offices of the state, there can be no such thing as a de facto office, and consequently no de facto officer, unless the office which he purports to hold is de jure. Hildreth's Heirs v. McIntire's Devisee, 24 Ky. (1 J. J. Marsh.) 206, 207, 19 Am. Dec. 61.

There is no such thing as an office de facto. City of New York v. Flagg (N. Y.) 6 Abb. Prac. 296, 302.

DE FACTO OFFICER.

An "officer de facto" is one whose acts, though not those of a lawful officer, the law, upon principles of policy and justice, will hold valid so far as they involve the interest of the public and third persons, where the duties of the office are exercised, first, without a known appointment or election, but under such circumstances of reputation or acquiescence as were calculated to induce people to submit to or invoke his action, supposing him to be the officer he assumed to be; second, under color of a known and valid appointment or election, but where the officer had failed to conform to some precedent requirement or condition, as to take an oath, give a bond, or the like; third, under color of a known election or appointment, void because the officer was not eligible, or because there was a want of power in the electing or appointing body, or by reason of some defect or irregularity, want of power or defect being unknown to the public; fourth, under color of election or appointment by or pursuant to a public unconstitutional law before the same is adjudged to be such. State v. Carroll, 38 Conn. 449, 471, 9 Am. Rep. 409; Norton v. Shelby County, 6 Sup. Ct. 1121, 1127, 118 U. S. 425, 30 L. Ed. 178; Continental Trust Co. v. Toledo, St. L. & K. R. Co. (U. S.) 82 Fed. 642, 650; Auditor General v. Menominee County Sup'rs (Mich.) 51 N. W. 483, 491, 89 Mich. 552; Ritchie v. Mulvane, 17 Pac. 830, 838, 39 Kan. 257; Richards v. Farmers' & Mechanics' Institute (Pa.) 26 Atl. 210, 211, 35 Am. St. Rep. 848; Walcott v. Wells, 24 Pac. 367, 370, 21 Nev. 47, 9 L. R. A. 59, 37 Am. St. Rep. 478; State v. Curtis, 9 Nev. 325, 329; State v. Blossom, 10 Pac. 430, 432, 19 Nev. 312; State v. Dierberger, 2 S. W. 236, 287, 90 Mo. 369; Perkins v. Fielding, 119 Mo. 149, 159, 24 S. W. 444, 27 S. W. 1100; Simpson v. McGonegal, 52 Mo. App. 540, 545; State v. Oates, 57 N. W. 296, 297, 86 Wis. 255, 39 Am. St. Rep. 912; Franklin v. Vandervort, 50 W. Va. 412, 416, 40 S. E. 374; Van Amringe v. Taylor, 108 N. C. 196, 201, 12 S. E. 1005, 12 L. R. A. 202, 23 Am. St. Rep. 51; State v. Carroll, 38 Conn. 449, 456, 9 Am. Rep. 409; Williams v. Boynton, 25 N. Y. Supp. 60, 64, 71 Hun. 309; Missouri Pac. Ry. Co. v. Preston, 66 Pac. 1050, 1051, 63 Kan. 819; Vanderberg v. Connolly, 54 Pac. 1097, 1100, 18 Utah, 112; Brown v. State, 68 S. W. 547, 548, 43 Tex. Cr. R. 411; People v. Hecht, 38 Pac. 941, 944, 105 Cal. 621, 27 L. R. A. 203, 45 Am. St. Rep. 96.

A de facto officer is one who enters into office under color of title thereto, but whose election or qualification is in fact irregular. Clegg v. State, 42 Tex. 605, 608; Commis- sloners of Trenton v. McDaniel, 52 N. C. 107, 113; People v. Cook, 8 N. Y. (4 Seld.) 67, 89, 59 Am. Dec. 451; Herkimer v. Keeler, 81 N. W. 178, 179, 109 Iowa, 680; Stickney v. Stickney, 42 N. W. 518, 519, 77 Iowa, 699; People v. Staton, 73 N. C. 546, 550, 21 Am. Rep. 479.

An officer de facto is one who has the reputation of being the officer he assumes to be, and yet is not a good officer in point of law. Barlow v. Stanford, 82 Ill. 298, 302; Mechanics' Nat. Bank v. H. C. Burnett Mfg. Co., 32 N. J. Eq. (5 Stew.) 236, 238; Kuser v. Wright (N. J.) 81 Atl. 397, 398; Brown v. Lunt, 37 Me. 423, 429; State v. Jacobs, 17 Ohio, 143, 152; Mapes v. People, 69 Ill. 523, 529; Rex v. Corporation of Bedford Level, 6 East, 356, 369; McGargell v. Hazelton Coal Co. (Pa.) 4 Watts & S. 424, 425; Gregg Tp. v. Jamison, 55 Pa. (5 P. F. Smith) 468, 473; Humer v. Cumberland County, 8 Pa. Dist. R. 528; Fleming v. Mulhall, 9 Mo. App. 71, 73 (citing Parker v. Kett, 1 Ld. Raym. 658); Clark v. Town of Easton, 14 N. E. 795, 797, 146 Mass. 43; Tucker v. Aiken, 7 N. H. 113, 140; Dows v. Village of Irvington (N. Y.) 66 How. Prac. 93, 95; Franco-Texan Land Co. v. Laigle, 59 Tex. 339, 344; State v. Curtis, 9 Nev. 325, 329; Attorney General v. Crocker, 138 Mass. 214, 218; State ex rel. Cosgrove v. Perkins, 40 S. W. 650, 652, 139 Mo. 106; Flournoy v. Clements, 7 Ala. 535, 538.

A de facto officer is one who exercises an office either by virtue of some appointment or election, or of such acquiescence of the public as will authorize the presumption, at least, of a colorable appointment or election. Pierce v. Edington, 38 Ark. 150, 158; Town of Plymouth v. Painter, 17 Conn. 585, 588, 44 Am. Dec. 574; Rice v. Commonwealth, 66 Ky. (3 Bush) 14, 17; Aulanier v. Governor, 1 Tex. 653, 665; People v. Albertson (N. Y.) 8 How. Prac. 363, 365; Wilcox v. Smith (N. Y.) 5 Wend. 231, 234, 21 Am. Dec. 213; People v. Church, 3 N. Y. Cr. R. 57, 59; People v. White (N. Y.) 24 Wend. 520, 581; Cary v. State, 76 Ala. 78, 85; Williamson v. Woolf, 37 Ala. 298, 304; Thorington v. Gould, 59 Ala. 461, 468; Dabney v. Hudson, 68 Miss. 292, 8 South. 545, 24 Am. St. Rep. 276.

In order to constitute an officer de facto, there must be some color of right—some pretense or claim of title by some appointment or election. He who assumes to execute the duties of an office without any color of title is a mere usurper, and the acts of the mere usurper are void in all respects. An officer de facto may act under those who have a legal right to appoint, but by an irregular or informal appointment, or he may have a regular and sufficient appointment, but may not have been duly qualified to perform his duties under it, or he may have become disqualified to act. But so long as he is claiming to be qualified and performing the duties of the office, this must be construed to give him some color of title. Prescott v. Hayes, 42 N. H. 56, 58.

The doctrine of de facto officers was introduced into the law as matter of policy and necessity, to protect the interests of the public and individuals whose interests were involved in the official acts of persons exercising the duties of an office without being lawful officers. It would seem that the public could not reasonably be compelled to inquire into the title of an officer, nor be compelled to show a title. But to protect those who dealt with such officers when apparent incumbents of offices, under such apparent circumstances of reputation or color as would lead men to suppose they were legal officers, the law validated their acts as to the public and third persons on the ground that, as to them, although not officers de jure, they were officers in fact, whose acts public policy required should be considered valid. Jewell v. Gilbert, 64 N. H. 13, 5 Atl. 80, 81, 10 Am. St. Rep. 357.

An officer de facto is one who comes in by the power of an election or appointment, but, in consequence of some informality or omission, or want of qualification, or by reason of the expiration of his term of service, cannot maintain his position when called on by the government to show by what title he claims to hold his office. He is one who exercises the duties of an office under claim and color of title, being distinguished on the one hand from a mere usurper, and on the other from an officer de jure. The judges of the Court of Appeals who were in office under military appointment when the state was restored to the Union, holding over and continuing to exercise their office, were officers de facto, and their judgments and decrees are valid and binding. Griffin's Ex'r v. Cunningham (Va.) 20 Grat. 31, 43.

A de facto officer is one who comes into a legal and constitutional office by power of legal appointment or election; and, even though the law under which such officer holds be unconstitutional or repugnant to the laws of Congress, he would still be a de facto officer, so that his title to the office could only be inquired into by a direct proceeding instituted for that purpose, and not by a collateral proceeding, as in habeas corpus. Ex parte Parks, 3 Mont. 426, 431.

An officer de facto is one who comes in by the terms of law, and acts under a commission or election apparently valid, but, in consequence of some illegality, incapacity, or want of qualification, is incapable of lawfully holding the office. The distinction between a usurper and an officer de facto is that the former has no color of title to the office, while the latter has, by virtue of some appointment or election. Fitchburg R. Co. v. Grand Junction R. & D. Co., 83 Mass. (1 Allen) 552, 557.

A person declared elected and inducted into office is a de facto officer, though not lawfully elected. Attorney General v. Meigin, 68 N. H. 378, 379.

An officer de facto is one who actually performs the duties of an office, with apparent right, and under claim or color of appointment or election. An officer de facto is distinguished from a usurper, and a person, in order to become an officer de facto, must in some way have been put into office and secured such a holding as to be considered in peaceable possession, and actually exercising the functions of an officer. So a trustee of a corporation, elected to fill a vacancy on the board by all the available members, but less than a majority thereof, who secured peaceable possession, is an officer de facto. Baggot v. Turner, 58 Pac. 212, 218, 21 Wash. 339.

A de facto officer is one who derives his appointment from one having colorable authority to appoint, if the office is an appointive office, and whose appointment is valid on its face. It is not necessary that an officer should derive his appointment from one absolutely competent to invest him with a good title to the office. Ex parte Strang, 21 Ohio St. 610, 617.

An officer is said to be de facto when he has the color of an appointment or election, although it may be, in law, invalid. It must not be utterly void. To enable those who make an appointment that will make the appointee an officer de facto, they must have the legal capacity to make it, but, by reason of some defect in the time or manner of the appointment, have failed to make a valid one. Hamlin v. Dingman (N. Y.) 5 Lans. 61, 64, 65.

"An officer de facto is one who executes the duties of an office under some color of right—some pretense of title—either by election or appointment." Hooper v. Goodwin, 48 Me. 79. The foundation stone of this whole doctrine of a de facto officer, as gathered from all the authorities, seems to be that of preventing the public or third persons from being deceived to their harm by relying in good faith upon the genuineness and validity of acts done by a pseudo-officer. However much color of authority may clothe the person who assumes to perform the function of an office and discharge its duties, yet if the public or third persons are not deceived thereby—if they know the true state of the case—the reason which gives origin or existence to the rule which validates the act of an officer de facto ceases, and with it ceases, also, all of its ordinary validating incidents and consequences. State ex rel. Cosgrove v. Perkins, 40 S. W. 650, 652, 139 Mo. 106.

An officer de facto is one who comes into a legal and constitutional office by color of the legal appointment or election to that office, and, as the duties of the office may be discharged by some one for the benefit of the public, the law does not require third persons, at their peril, to ascertain whether such officer has been properly elected or appointed before they submit themselves to his authority, or call upon him to perform official acts which it is necessary should be performed. People v. White (N. Y.) 24 Wend. 520, 539 (quoted in People v. McDowell, 23 N. Y. Supp. 950, 70 Hun, 1).

The general rule with respect to de facto officers is that the office is so far void as to prevent the officer from asserting it to his own advantage at the expense or injury of another, but is valid so far as to protect third parties from injury—in other words, void as to himself and valid as to strangers. Adams v. Tator (N. Y.) 42 Hun, 384, 386, (quoted in People v. McDowell, 23 N. Y. Supp. 950, 952, 70 Hun, 1).

An officer de facto is one who by some color of right is in possession of an office, and for the time being performs its duties with public acquiescence, though having no right in fact, as where the appointing body is acting under an unconstitutional law. An unconstitutional act attaching territory to a certain county, accepted and acquiesced in, will suffice to render the acts of the register of deeds of such county as to such territory, done before the law was declared unconstitutional, the acts of a de facto officer. State Bank v. Frey (Neb.) 91 N. W. 239, 242.

An officer de facto is one who actually performs the duties of the office that appertain thereto under color of appointment or election. There must be a fair color of right, or an acquiescence by the public in his official acts so long that he may be presumed to act as an officer by right of election or appointment. Thus a deputy sheriff who had been acting as such was a de facto officer, though he had not taken the oath of office or filed his appointment for record as required by law. State v. Quint, 69 Pac. 171, 172, 65 Kan. 144.

An officer de facto is not a mere usurper, nor yet within the sanction of the law, but one who, colore officii, claims and assumes to exercise official authority, is reputed to have it, and the community acquiesces accordingly. Ex parte Haly, 25 Pac. 514, 515, 1 Okl. 12 (citing Hussey v. Smith, 99 U. S. 20, 25 L. Ed. 314; State v. Murphy, 13 South. 705, 713, 32 Fla. 138).

"What shall constitute an officer de facto may admit of some doubt in different cases. The mere assumption of the office by performing one or even several acts appropriate to it, without any recognition of the person as officer by the appointing power, may not be sufficient to constitute him an officer de facto. There must be at least some color-able election and induction into the office ab origine, and some action thereunder, or so long an exercise of the office, and acquiescence therein of the public authorities, as to afford an individual citizen a strong presumption that the party was duly appointed." Blencourt v. Parker, 27 Tex. 558, 563.

An office may be held de facto by a person whose legal incapacity to hold it is imposed upon him by a prohibitory provision of the Constitution. His disability may arise from a fact that is not apparent. But the principle that forbids a collateral inquiry into the validity of an appointment or election has a broader foundation than a latent defect, discoverable only in extraneous evidence. A colorable appointment may be made by a body or person whose total lack of appointing power is matter of law. An unconstitutional statute, void on its face, can give color of official title. A person called in on a single occasion to exercise a power, which the void statute purports to confer upon him may be an officer de facto whose title cannot be assailed collaterally. So it is held that a person duly appointed by the selectmen a police officer, to hold during the pleasure of the selectmen, is an officer de facto, and his right to act as a police officer cannot be attacked on a trial for an assault on him while so acting for the first time. State v. Barnard, 29 Atl. 410, 411, 67 N. H. 222, 68 Am. St. Rep. 648.

A person inducted into an office according to the forms of law is an officer de facto, although incompetent by the provisions of the Constitution to hold the office, and his competency cannot be inquired into by the parties affected by his act. City of Nashville v. Thompson, 80 Tenn. (12 Lea) 344, 347.

A mere usurper cannot be said to be an officer de facto, yet one who was at first a mere usurper may by acquiescence become an officer de facto. Although an officer de facto may not be required to be in by color of election or appointment, yet he must, to distinguish him from a mere usurper or intruder, be in by some color of right; and the color of right which constitutes one an officer de facto may consist in an election or appointment, or the holding over after the expiration of one's term, or acquiescence by the public in the acts of such officer for such a length of time as to raise the presumption of colorable right by election or appointment. Auditor General v. Menominee County Sup'rs, 51 N. W. 483, 490, 89 Mich. 552.

The mere assumption of an office by performing one or even several acts appropriate to it, without any recognition of the person as officer by the appointing power, may not be sufficient to constitute him an officer de facto. There must at least be some colorable election and induction into office ab origine, or so long an exercise of the office and acquiescence therein of the public authorities as to afford to the individual citizen a presumption strong of due appointment. Burke v. Elliott, 26 N. C. 355, 362, 42 Am. Dec. 142.

In order to prove a person to be an officer de facto, it is necessary to show that he has acted as such on other occasions than those which are the subject of the controversy. Goulding v. Clark, 34 N. H. 148, 154.

A party exercising the right of arrest under a statute providing that all persons have the right to prevent the consequences of theft by seizing any personal property which has been stolen, and bringing it, with the offender, if he can be taken, before a magistrate, is to all intents and purposes an officer de facto for the time being, and his acts, whilst such relation to the arrested person continues, will subject him, in effect, to the same rights and penalties as attach to officers de jure. Smith v. State, 13 Tex. App. 507, 513.

Under Pub. St. c. 27, § 74, providing that any town that accepted the provisions of that and the three following sections may elect three road supervisors, where a town, without accepting such provisions, for several years elected several persons as road supervisors, who qualified and served as such, they were officers de facto. Clark v. Town of Easton, 14 N. E. 795, 797, 146 Mass. 43.

An officer legally elected and qualified, who enters upon the duties of his office, and afterwards is appointed to and accepts another office, but in good faith continues to publicly discharge the duties of the first office—his term not having expired, and no successor having been appointed or elected in his stead, nor any adjudication against his title—is an officer de facto. Oliver v. Jersey City, 44 Atl. 709, 711, 63 N. J. Law. 634, 48 L. R. A. 412, 76 Am. St. Rep. 228.

One who is performing the duties of the office of marshal of a town under color of title to such office is a de facto peace officer, and, as such, exempt from the penalty prescribed for one who shall carry a pistol into a church, school, or ballroom, etc. Rainey v. State, 8 Tex. App. 62, 64, 34 Am. Rep. 736.

Where a person who acted as commissioner had been appointed, and, under color of the appointment, he assumed to, and did, exercise the functions of the office, he was a de facto officer. People v. Lytle, 7 App. Div. 553, 573, 40 N. Y. Supp. 153, 162.

If an office is filled and the duties appertaining thereto are performed by an officer de jure, another person, although claiming the office under color of title, cannot become an officer de facto. State v. Blossom, 10 Pac. 430, 432, 19 Nev. 312.

A de facto officer must be in fact the officer. He must be in the actual possession of the office, and have the same under his actual control. If the officer de jure is in the possession of the office—if the officer is also the officer de facto, then no other person can be an officer de facto for that purpose. Two persons cannot be officers de facto for the same office at the same time. McCahon v. Leavenworth County Com'rs, 8 Kan. 437, 442.

Where an office exists under the law, and a person is elected to fill such office, and duly qualifies and enters upon the discharge of his official duties, he is a de facto officer, and his acts are valid, notwithstanding the fact that he may not possess all the requisites and qualifications prescribed by the statute to fill such office. In Hussey v. Smith, 99 U. S. 20, 25 L. Ed. 314, the Supreme Court of the United States, in discussing this subject, said: "An officer de facto is not a mere usurper, nor yet within the sanction of law, but one who, colore officii, claims and assumes to exercise official authority, is reputed to have it, and the community acquiesces accordingly. Judicial as well as ministerial officers may be in this position." Morford v. Territory, 63 Pac. 958, 960, 10 Okl. 741, 54 L. R. A. 513.

The mere fact that one is found in the exercise of the duties of an officer without question of his authority as such is not sufficient to constitute him a de facto officer, unless he is in such office by some color of right or title, even though he may be apparently invested with all the insignia of office. A judge signing a decree December 6th in an action tried before him in November preceding was a de facto officer while signing the decree, though it transpired that his term of office expired on December 2d. Cromer v. Boinest, 27 S. C. 436, 452, 3 S. E. 849.

When an official person or body has apparent authority to appoint to public office, and apparently exercises such authority, and the person so appointed enters upon such office and performs his duties, his official acts will be valid. Erwin v. City of Jersey City, 37 Atl. 732, 733, 60 N. J. Law, 141, 64 Am. St. Rep. 584.

De jure office required.

There can be no de facto officer without a de jure office. State v. Stevens (S. D.) 92 N. W. 420, 421 (citing Thurber v. Miller, 11 S. D. 131, 75 N. W. 901).

To constitute an officer de facto, there must be an office, with a place for its exercise, and an incumbent under claim of right. State v. Lake, 8 Nev. 276, 285.

Where there is an office legally existing, and a person is appointed or elected to fill such office, his acts will be held valid, as those of a de facto officer, although a statute has prescribed an unconstitutional method for the appointment or election of such officers. Where, however, the office itself is created by an unconstitutional statute, there can be no incumbent of such office, either de jure or de facto. Flaucher v. City of Camden, 28 Atl. 82, 83, 56 N. J. Law (27 Vroom) 244.

Many of the definitions of a de facto officer in the text-books of decided cases assume that there can be no de facto officer except in a de jure office; and Dill. Mun. Corp. § 276, says that, in order that there may be a de facto officer, there must be a de jure office, and that the notion that there can be a de facto office has been characterized as a political solecism. Burt v. Winona & St. P. R. Co., 18 N. W. 285, 286, 31 Minn. 472.

Under a written Constitution creating and defining the various offices of the state, there can be no such thing as a de facto office, and consequently no de facto officer, unless the office which he purports to hold is de jure. Hildreth's Heirs v. McIntire's Devisee, 24 Ky. (1 J. J. Marsh.) 206, 207, 19 Am. Dec. 61.

"Offices must be de jure, but officers may be such de facto. To say that an officer is one de facto, when the office itself is not created or authorized by the Legislature, is a political solecism, having no foundation in reason, nor support in law." Welch v. St. Genevieve (U. S.) 29 Fed. Cas. 608, 610.

A de facto officer is one who comes into a legal and constitutional office by color of a legal appointment or election to the office, and, as the duty of the office must be discharged by some one for the benefit of the public, the law does not require third persons, at their peril, to ascertain whether such officer has been properly elected or appointed, but they submit themselves to this authority to call upon him to perform official acts which it is necessary he should perform. Mallett v. Uncle Sam Gold & Silver Min. Co., 1 Nev. 188, 197, 90 Am. Dec. 484.

A de facto officer is one who is surrounded with the insignia of office and seems to act with authority, but where there is no office there cannot be a de facto officer. Jay v. Board of Education of City of Emporia, 26 Pac. 1025, 1026, 46 Kan. 525.

Where an act creating a county court was void because unconstitutional, the officers constituting it were not de facto officers. Norton v. Shelby County, 6 Sup. Ct. 1121, 1127, 118 U. S. 425, 30 L. Ed. 178.

An unconstitutional act is sufficient to give color for the appointment to office thereunder, so made to render the person an officer de facto. In re Ah Lee (U. S.) 5 Fed. 899, 907.

Where the office of freeholder is created by the Constitution, it is a de jure office; and when persons were elected by a plurality of the qualified electors, and received their certificates of election, and qualified, and participated in the action of the board, they were there under colore officii, and presumptively entitled to the office. They were de facto officers in the discharge of the duties of a de jure office, and, as such, their acts while they remained such were as valid and binding as those of de jure officers. There must be a de jure office to be filled before there can be a de facto officer. If the former exists, and the latter holds it under and pursuant to a regular commission purporting to empower him to act, his acts in such office, until his right thereto is finally determined, the law holds, on principles of policy and justice, to be valid, so far as they involve the public and third parties, notwithstanding the personal liability of the incumbent for intruding into such office. People v. Hecht, 38 Pac. 941, 944, 105 Cal. 621, 27 L. R. A. 203, 45 Am. St. Rep. 96.

Hold over.

The term de facto officer includes one who assumes an office legally, but in good faith continues to hold such office after his title has ended. State v. Farrier, 1 Atl. 751, 753, 47 N. J. Law (18 Vroom) 383.

Where the terms of a board of county commissioners had expired, and others had been appointed in their places, the former board were not officers de facto, where no general acquiescence was shown as to their acts as such. State v. Murphy, 13 South. 705, 716, 32 Fla. 138.

Officers coming rightfully into office, though improperly continuing in office, are generally regarded as officers de facto. Thorington v. Gould, 59 Ala. 461, 468.

One who retained possession of his office after the expiration of his regular term was an officer de facto, though at the same time another had been regularly elected and had qualified as his successor. As long as the de jure officer was not in possession of the office, the acts of his predecessor were those of a de facto officer. Carl v. Rhener, 7 N. W. 139, 27 Minn. 292.

A person who was the incumbent of an office during a previous term is not a de facto officer as to such office by holding over after the expiration of such time. State v. Oates, 57 N. W. 296, 297, 86 Wis. 634, 39 Am. St. Rep. 912.

As an officer.

See "Officer."

Officer de jure distinguished.

An officer de facto is one who exercises the duties of an office under color of an appointment or election to that office, and he differs, on the one hand, from a mere usurper of an office, who undertakes to act as an officer without any color of right, and, on the other, from an officer de jure, who is in all respects legally appointed and qualified to exercise the office. Steinback v. State, 38 Ind. 483, 490; Town of Plymouth v. Painter, 17 Conn. 585, 588, 44 Am. Dec. 574. Under this definition, a judge who has tendered a conditional resignation is at the very least an officer de facto until it has been accepted by the government. Northrop v. Gregory (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 373. And so, where the Legislature authorized the common council of Hartford to appoint a judge of the police court, and they so appointed the judge, he was an officer de facto, though the act of the Legislature was entirely unconstitutional, and the General Assembly itself was the only body by whom the appointment could be made, since the attempted delegation of power to the council gave it a color of right to appoint the judge. Park, J., dissenting. Brown v. O'Connell, 38 Conn. 432, 458, 4 Am. Rep. 89.

The distinction between an officer de jure and de facto is well known and well established, and the consequences naturally arising from the distinction are equally well settled. An officer de jure is clothed with all the power and authority appertaining to the office, and neither his doings nor his acts within the limits of his authority can be questioned anywhere. The acts of an officer de facto are, as it respects third persons, valid; as to himself, invalid. An officer de facto is one who comes in by the forms of an election, but, in consequence of some informality or want of qualification, is incapable of holding office. McGregor v. Balch, 14 Vt. 428, 436, 39 Am. Dec. 231.

An officer de facto is one who actually performs the duties of an office with apparent right, and under claim and color of an appointment or election. On the one hand, such an officer is distinguished from a mere usurper of an office, and, on the other, from an officer de jure. In order to make a person an officer de facto, he should in some way have been put into the office, and have secured such a holding thereof as to be considered in peaceable possession, and actually exercising the functions of an officer. An intrusion by force is not sufficient. State v. Curtis, 9 Nev. 325, 329.

To constitute a de jure officer there must be either a valid election or appointment, and a qualification thereunder. Where there was no record in the county superintendent's office of the qualification of one who was acting as trustee under an appointment to fill a vacancy, he was not a de jure officer, but only a de facto officer. Meadors v. Patrick, 56 S. W. 652, 653, 24 Ky. Law Rep. 95.

An officer de facto is one who exercises the duty of an office under a color of right by virtue of election to that office, as distinguished, on the one hand, from a mere usurper of an office, and, on the other, from an officer de jure. The acts of an officer de facto are valid so far as the rights of the public or third person are concerned, and cannot be indirectly called in question in a proceeding to which he is not a party. Therefore though a majority of a common council of a city, owing to the calling of an election at a date not authorized by statute, were elected in an unlawful manner, its acts were not void. Mitchell v. Tolan, 33 N. J. Law (4 Vroom) 195, 201.

A de facto officer is distinguished, on the one hand, from a mere usurper of an office, and, on the other, from an officer de jure. He is one who is in actual possession of an office under claim and color of election or appointment, and is in the exercise of its functions and in discharge of its duties. It is said that the best definition of an officer de facto is as follows: "An officer de facto is one who has the reputation of being the officer he assumes to be, and yet is not a good officer in point of law." Waterman v. Chicago & I. R. Co., 139 Ill. 658, 29 N. E. 689, 691, 15 L. R. A. 418, 32 Am. St. Rep. 228.

Person failing to qualify.

An officer de facto is one acting under color of authority, and, so far as the public or third persons are interested, acts as if he were an officer de jure. A highway surveyor acting under color of authority pursuant to an appointment signed by a majority of the municipal officers is an officer de facto, and authorized to bind the town, within the scope of his authority, as far as the public or third persons are concerned; and the fact that the appointee had not been sworn did not prevent him from being a de facto officer. Pease v. Inhabitants of Parsonsfield, 42 Atl. 502, 92 Me. 345.

Where the deputy sheriff, on being appointed, refused to take the oath, and cut the same off his appointment, and there was no showing that he exercised the duties of the office, or had the reputation in the county of being deputy sheriff, he was an officer de facto. Brown v. State, 66 S. W. 547, 548, 43 Tex. Cr. R. 411.

If one duly elected sheriff qualifies by filing his official oath and bond, and thereupon enters on the duties of the office and exercises its functions, he is sheriff de facto, so that his right to the office cannot be successfully attacked in a collateral proceeding; and he cannot protect himself from official responsibility upon the ground that he failed to qualify in due time after his election, or that he qualified under an invalid appointment by the Governor, or that his bond is defective. Sprague v. Brown, 40 Wis. 612.

Under a statute providing that the court might appoint six surveyors of the highways to lay out a road, and directing such persons within six days to subscribe the oath of office, and providing that, if this oath should not be taken or subscribed within the time prescribed, the neglect should be deemed a refusal to serve in such office, the person refusing is not an officer, and cannot be considered an officer de facto, so as to render his acts valid. In re Public Road, 4 N. J. Law (1 Southard) 396, 398.

Where a person was appointed by a constable as deputy, but failed to take an oath, he was an officer de facto. State v. Dierberger, 2 S. W. 286, 287, 90 Mo. 369.

One who, having been elected to an office, assumes to exercise its duties without having qualified or attempting to do so, is without color of title, and hence not a de facto officer. Creighton v. Commonwealth, 83 Ky. 142, 147, 4 Am. St. Rep. 148.

Rightful government required.

To constitute a de facto officer, there must be a rightful government. A de facto officer of an illegal or unlawful government is an anomaly that can only exist in absurdity. Penn v. Tollison, 26 Ark. 545, 580.

When a government is entirely revolutionized, and all its departments usurped by force, there may be a de facto executive, a de facto judiciary, or a de facto legislature; but, where the Constitution or form of government remains supreme, there can be no de facto department or a de facto office. Frame v. Trebble, 24 Ky. (1 J. J. Marsh.) 205, 206.

DE FACTO ROAD.

A "de facto road" means a road actually used by the public. Locke v. First Division of St. Paul & P. R. Co., 15 Minn. 350, 365 (Gil. 283, 298).

DE FACTO SENATOR.

The act of the Senate in acquiescing when a person acts as senator is sufficient to give him color of title to the office, and makes him at least a senator de facto. Auditor General v. Menominee County Sup'rs, 51 N. W. 483, 490, 89 Mich. 552.

DE JURE.

"De jure" means of right; legitimate; lawful; by right and just title. In this sense, it is the contrary of "de facto." It may also be contrasted with "de gratia," in which case it means "as a matter of right," as de gratia means "by grace or favor." Again, it may be contrasted with "de æquitate," here meaning "by law," as the latter means "by equity." Black, Dict.

DE JURE CORPORATION.

Corporations de jure have been defined to be those whose legal right to exist cannot be questioned even by the state itself. If a corporation has a charter issued to it in the manner prescribed by law, and has in its organization complied fully with every requirement of the charter, then, even as against the state, the corporation has a right to exist, and is technically a de jure corporation. Brown v. Atlanta Ry. & Power Co., 39 S. E. 71, 73, 113 Ga. 462.

A de jure corporation is one whose right to exercise a corporate function would prove invulnerable if assailed by the state by quo warranto proceedings. Capps v. Hastings Prospecting Co., 58 N. W. 956, 957, 40 Neb. 470, 24 L. R. A. 259, 42 Am. St. Rep. 677.

DE JURE DIRECTOR.

A director duly elected or appointed is a director de jure. Hullings v. Hullings Lumber Co., 18 S. E. 620, 624, 38 W. Va. 351.

DE JURE OFFICER.

De facto officer distinguished, see "De Facto Officer."

A de jure office is one having legal existence, or, rather, one having an existence recognized by law. Buck v. City of Eureka, 42 Pac. 243, 245, 109 Cal. 504, 30 L. R. A. 409.

"A de jure officer is one who is regularly and lawfully elected or appointed and inducted into office, and exercises the duties as his right." People v. Staton, 73 N. C. 546, 550, 21 Am. Rep. 479.

An officer de jure is one who is clothed with the full legal right and title of the office—in other words, one who has been legally elected or appointed to the office, and who has qualified himself to exercise the duties thereof according to the mode prescribed by law. McMillin v. Richards, 64 N. W. 242, 243, 45 Neb. 786; Stott v. City of Chicago, 68 N. E. 736, 738, 205 Ill. 281.

An officer de jure is one who has the lawful right to the office, but who has either been ousted from, or never actually taken possession of, the office. Hamlin v. Kassafer, 15 Pac. 778, 780, 15 Or. 456, 3 Am. St. Rep. 176.

An officer de jure has the legal title to, and is clothed with all the power and authority of, the office. He has a title against the world to exercise the functions of the office, and receive the fees and emoluments appertaining to it. He is responsible to the government and injured parties when he abuses or transcends his authority, and his acts within the scope of that authority cannot be questioned by the citizens or any department of the government. Auditor General v. Menominee County Sup'rs, 89 Mich. 552, 625, 51 N. W. 483.

DE LUNATICO INQUIRENDO.

See "Commission de Lunatico Inquirendo."

DE NOVO.

See "Trial de Novo"; "Venire Facias de Novo."

DE QUARANTINA HABENDA.

At common law a widow entitled to quarantine could, in case the heir or other persons ejected her, sue out a writ known as the "writ de quarantina habenda." Jacob's Law Dict. tit. "Quarantine," § 19. This seems to have been a summary process, and required the sheriff, if no just cause were shown against it, speedily to put her into possession. In Oregon the right by statute secured to a widow, of remaining in the husband's house one year, cannot be enforced by the action of forcible entry and detainer. Aiken v. Aiken, 12 Or. 203, 206, 6 Pac. 682, 683.

DEAD.

Deprived of life; opposed to alive. Living; destitute of life; inanimate. Webst. Dict.

DEAD ANIMALS.

"Dead animals," as used in a city ordinance directing the city inspector to forthwith remove all putrid and unsound beef, pork, etc., all dead animals, and every unwholesome substance found in the city, is to be construed to mean such dead animals as in some way endanger the public health, and does not apply to all dead animals. Underwood v. Green, 42 N. Y. 140, 142.

DEAD BLOCKS.

See "Deadwoods."

Dead blocks are bumpers or metallic projections placed on railroad cars to receive the concussion and the shock when moving cars come in contact with stationary ones; the drawheads being so constructed as to yield to pressure, so as to leave the shock of the collision to the dead blocks. Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Cottrell, 3 S. E. 123, 127, 83 Va. 512.

DEAD BODY.

As property, see "Property."

Bones bleached by time, constituting parts of a human skeleton, casually found upon the bank of a creek—it being obviously impossible to ascertain who the deceased was, how long since death had ensued, or in what manner it was caused—did not constitute a dead body, within Act Dec. 14, 1893, relating to coroners' inquests. Meads v. Dougherty County, 25 S. E. 915, 98 Ga. 697.

A dead body after burial becomes a part of the ground to which it has been committed, and an action of trespass may be maintained by the owner of the lot in possession against one who disturbs the grave and removes the body, so long, at least, as the cemetery continues to be used as a place of burial. Pulsifer v. Douglass, 48 Atl. 118, 119, 94 Me. 556, 53 L. R. A. 238 (citing Meagher v. Driscoll, 99 Mass. 281, 96 Am. Dec. 759; Weld v. Walker, 130 Mass. 422, 39 Am. Rep. 465; Bessemer Land & Improvement Co. v. Jenkins, 111 Ala. 135, 18 South. 565, 56 Am. St. Rep. 26).

DEAD CULLS.

Dead culls are the unavoidable product from the saw in sawing logs, distinguishable from the higher grades produced, which higher grades include shipping culls and better, and mill culls being everything above the grade of dead culls. Brigham v. Martin, 61 N. W. 276, 277, 103 Mich. 150.

DEAD FREIGHT.

Dead freight is the amount of damages, unascertained, which the parties are entitled to recover for a noncompletion of a cargo. Phillips v. Rodie, 15 East, 547, 555.

DEAD SLOW.

"Dead slow," as applied to the speed of a vessel, means a speed of about four knots an hour—just enough to give such a vessel steerageway. The Oceanic (U. S.) 61 Fed. 338, 343.

DEAD TIMBER.

Dead timber is timber which is practically lifeless or mortally hurt, and in such a state of decay that a prudent landowner would ordinarily direct it to be forthwith cut, to prevent further deterioration in value. United States v. Pine River Logging & Improvement Co. (U. S.) 89 Fed. 907, 915, 32 C. C. A. 406.

DEAD WALLS.

As used in 43 Geo. III, c. 139, relating to a rate for street repairs, and providing that the commissioners should rate and assess all the churchyards, cemeteries, or other burying places, dead walls, and void spaces of ground within such parochial or other district which are not charged to such rate or assessment, in respect to any messuage, the term "dead walls" would include those erected by a railway company under an act requiring it to build a bridge over its railway, with a brick wall at each side thereof, at a spot where its railway intersected a public street or road which was paved and repaired under the local acts. Arnell v. London & N. W. Ry. Co., 12 C. B. 697, 710.

DEAD WEIGHT.

The dead weight to which a bank is entitled under Act Feb. 5, 1842, providing that, with a view of enabling banks effectually to secure their debts, it shall be lawful for their respective boards of directors to consider the whole of the debts due them on the passage of this act as forming part of their dead weight, includes only the debts due banks at the time of the passage of the act, and not debts subsequently contracted, though between the date of the passage of the act and its promulgation or acceptance by the banks. City Bank of New Orleans v. Barbarin (La.) 6 Rob. 289, 291.

DEADHEAD.

"The term 'deadhead' is applied to persons other than the president, directors, officers, or employes of a railroad company who are permitted by the company to travel on the road without paying any fare therefor." Gardner v. Hall, 61 N. C. 21, 22.

DEADLY.

A charge relative to self-defense based on apparent danger, to the effect that the defendant must have had reasonable ground to believe that there was danger to his life, or of deadly violence to his person, is not error, where it clearly appears from the charge that the word "deadly" was used in the sense of great. Acers v. United States, 17 Sup. Ct. 91, 92, 164 U. S. 388, 41 L. Ed. 481.

While "deadly" and "dangerous" are not equivalents, deadly is more than the equivalent, and includes the full signification, of "dangerous." A dangerous weapon may possibly not be deadly, but a deadly weapon—one which is capable of causing death—must be dangerous. State v. Lynch, 33 Atl. 978, 979, 88 Me. 195.

DEADLY WEAPON.

Other deadly weapon, see "Other."

A deadly weapon is one likely to produce death or great bodily injury. State v. Jarrott, 23 N. C. 76, 87; Briggs v. State, 6 Tex.

App. 144, 146; Pittman v. State, 6 South. 437, 438, 25 Fla. 648; Garner v. State, 9 South. 835, 846, 28 Fla. 113, 29 Am. St. Rep. 232; People v. Franklin, 11 Pac. 797, 70 Cal. 641; People v. Leyba, 16 Pac. 200, 201, 74 Cal. 407; People v. Lopez, 66 Pac. 965, 966, 135 Cal. 23; People v. Fuqua, 58 Cal. 245, 247; People v. Valliere, 56 Pac. 433, 434, 123 Cal. 576; McNary v. People, 32 Ill. App. 58, 62; Clary v. State, 85 N. W. 897, 898, 61 Neb. 688; Wilson v. State, 15 Tex. App. 150, 155; Skidmore v. State, 43 Tex. 93, 97.

A deadly weapon is one which, in the manner used, is capable of producing death, or of inflicting great bodily injury, or seriously wounding. McReynolds v. State, 4 Tex. App. 327, 328; People v. Cole, 11 Pac. 481, 483, 70 Cal. 59. In a case of doubt, the manner in which the weapon is used may be taken into account, in determining whether or not it was deadly. Mazzotte v. Territory (Ariz.) 71 Pac. 911, 912; Commonwealth v. Duncan, 91 Ky. 592, 595, 16 S. W. 530.

A deadly weapon is one dangerous to life. Cosby v. Commonwealth, 72 S. W. 1089, 1090, 24 Ky. Law Rep. 2050.

A deadly weapon is any weapon or instrument by which death would likely be produced when used in a manner in which it may appear it was used in the affray. State v. Bowles, 47 S. W. 892, 893, 146 Mo. 6, 69 Am. St. Rep. 598.

A weapon may be a deadly weapon, although not specially designated for offensive or defensive purposes, or for the destruction of life or the infliction of injury. Blige v. State, 20 Fla. 742, 754, 51 Am. Rep. 628.

"Deadly weapon," as used in Rev. St. c. 28, art. 6, is not restricted to such weapons or instruments as are made and designed for offensive or defensive purposes, or for the destruction of life or the infliction of injury, but embraces any instrument with which a person may be wounded by cutting or stabbing. Commonwealth v. Branham, 71 Ky. (8 Bush) 387, 388.

A deadly weapon is an instrument used, or that may be used, for the purpose of offense or defense, capable of producing death. Some weapons are per se deadly. Others, owing to the manner in which they are used, become deadly. A gun, a pistol, or a dirk knife is of itself deadly. A small pocket-knife, a walking cane, a switch of the size of a woman's finger, if strong and tough, may be made a deadly weapon, if the aggressor shall use such instrument with great or furious violence, and especially if the party assailed should have comparatively less power than the assailant, or be helpless and feeble. State v. Huntley, 91 N. C. 617, 620.

Where an instrument appears prima facie capable of taking life or grievously hurting, it is proper for the court to say, as a matter of law, that the weapon is a deadly one. State v. Craton, 28 N. C. 164, 181.

The question whether the weapon is deadly, within the meaning of the law of homicide, is by some writers said to be one of fact for the jury. Mr. Bishop, on the other hand, says: "It is one likely to produce death or great bodily injury. In case of doubt, the manner in which it was used may be taken into consideration in determining whether or not it was deadly; and, when all the facts are established, the question whether a particular weapon was deadly, or not, is one of law, for the court. Yet practically, as in most instances, the establishment of the fact awaits the verdict, and the jury must pass upon the question under instruction of the court." Bishop's Statutory Crimes, 320. Where a weapon and the manner of its use in the commission of assault are such as to admit of but one conclusion in that respect, the question whether or not it is deadly is one of law, and the court should take the responsibility of so declaring. Krchnavy v. State, 61 N. W. 628, 629, 43 Neb. 337.

In Pittman v. State, 25 Fla. 648, 6 South. 437, the court said "that any weapon is a deadly weapon which is likely to produce death, but a weapon capable of producing death is not necessarily a weapon likely to produce death." Stone v. Heggie, 34 South. 146, 147, 82 Miss. 410.

Ax.

An ax will be presumed to be a deadly weapon. Dollarhide v. United States (Iowa) Morris, 233, 39 Am. Dec. 460.

An ax is a deadly weapon, ex vi termini, without further description. State v. Shields, 14 S. E. 779, 780, 110 N. C. 497.

Under a statute punishing an assault with a knife, sword, or other deadly weapon, with intent to kill, it is held that the phrase "other deadly weapon" cannot be restricted to such weapons only as are carried with the person, concealed or otherwise. The phrase should not be construed according to the rule of eiusdem generis, and is sufficiently broad to include an ax. Wilson v. Commonwealth, 66 Ky. (3 Bush) 105, 106.

An ax is not necessarily a deadly weapon. Melton v. State, 17 S. W. 257, 258, 30 Tex. App. 273.

Brass knuckles.

Though brass knuckles are named, with other weapons, in 2 Pasch. Dig. art. 6512, "as deadly weapons," yet it is necessary to charge in an indictment for an aggravated assault with a deadly weapon that the brass knuckles were a deadly weapon. Wilks v. State, 3 Tex. App. 34, 35.

Chair.

A chair is not necessarily a deadly weapon. Whether it is such must depend on its size or weight, in connection with the manner of its use, and the part of the person that is stricken with it. There may be chairs so small that they would not, when so used, be likely to produce death or serious bodily injury. Kouns v. State, 3 Tex. App. 13, 15.

Chisel.

A chisel may be a deadly weapon. Commonwealth v. Branham, 71 Ky. (8 Bush) 387, 388.

Club or stick.

A club is a deadly weapon, within the definition that a deadly weapon is a weapon likely to produce death or do great bodily harm. State v. Phillips, 10 S. E. 463, 464, 104 N. C. 786.

A club may be a deadly weapon. McNary v. People, 32 Ill. App. 58, 62.

A rock or club is not necessarily a deadly weapon, but may be made so in the hands of a malicious or infuriated person of ordinary strength, if used in an attack upon another with intent to take his life. The physical strength of the person using the instrument or weapon is to be considered by the jury in determining whether it is a deadly weapon. Cosby v. Commonwealth, 72 S. W. 1089, 1090, 24 Ky. Law Rep. 2050.

It is held in North Carolina that a stick with which in fact no serious injury was inflicted is not a deadly weapon. State v. Ray, 89 N. C. 587.

An oaken staff nearly three feet long, of a diameter of one inch and a half or two inches, with which three blows were struck on a man drunk, shattering the bones of the head and rupturing the interior vessels of the brain, was a deadly weapon. State v. West, 51 N. C. 505, 509.

A piece of pine weather boarding, 14 to 18 inches long, three-fourths of an inch thick, and 6 inches wide at one end, departing to a point at the other end, was not a deadly weapon in the hands of a sickly boy, 15 years old, weighing about 80 pounds, who held it by the small end, and struck with its large end the legs and back of an adult. State v. Sinclair, 27 S. E. 77, 78, 120 N. C. 603.

A good-sized or fair-sized walking stick, made of bois d'arc and loaded, is not a deadly weapon. Stevens v. State, 27 Tex. App. 461, 11 S. W. 459.

Fence pole.

A black-jack fence pole, though used for a rail, is not necessarily a deadly weapon.

It might have been so large, heavy, and unwieldy as to be harmless in the hands of a man, or it might have been so small or rotten as to be not at all dangerous. As to whether or not the weapon is in fact a deadly one is a matter of proof, and depends in some cases upon the manner of its use or attempted use. Wilson v. State, 15 Tex. App. 150, 155.

Hoe.

A hoe may be a deadly weapon. Hamilton v. People, 113 Ill. 34, 38, 55 Am. Rep. 396.

Iron weight.

A deadly weapon is a weapon with which death can be produced when used in the manner in which defendant on trial used it on the occasion mentioned in the indictment; it being admitted that defendant used an iron weight, and there being no conflict in the evidence as to its use, but only as to its size. Long v. Commonwealth, 35 S. W. 919, 18 Ky. Law Rep. 176.

Knife.

A drawn knife is a deadly weapon. Coker v. State, 2 S. W. 615, 616, 22 Tex. App. 20.

A knife with which defendant stabbed deceased, causing his death, is a deadly weapon. State v. Bowles, 47 S. W. 892, 893, 146 Mo. 6, 69 Am. St. Rep. 598.

A knife may be a deadly weapon. McNary v. People, 32 Ill. App. 58, 62.

Pin.

The pushing of a pin down an infant's throat, producing its death thereby, is killing it with a deadly weapon. The question whether an instrument with which a personal injury has been inflicted is a deadly weapon depends not infrequently more upon the manner of its use than upon the intrinsic character of the instrument itself. We may expect death to ensue from pushing a pin down the throat of an infant, just as we may look for death or serious bodily harm as a consequence of firing a pistol into a crowd of human beings or at a particular person. State v. Norwood, 20 S. E. 712, 115 N. C. 789, 44 Am. St. Rep. 498.

Piece of pipe.

In a contention that a piece of pipe was not a deadly weapon, it was stated that, if the weapon was shown to be one calculated to produce death, then, in law, it would become a deadly weapon. Danforth v. State, 69 S. W. 159-163, 44 Tex. Cr. R. 105.

Pistol.

A pistol used to strike with is not necessarily a deadly weapon, but may be such, or not, according to the size and manner of using it. McLendon v. State (Tex.) 66 S. W. 553, 554 (citing Shadle v. State, 34 Tex. 572; Stephenson v. State, 33 Tex. Cr. R. 162, 25 S. W. 784). See, also, Pierce v. State, 1 S. W. 463, 464, 21 Tex. App. 540; Ballard v. State (Tex.) 13 S. W. 674. Where it appears that an assault with a pistol was committed by using the pistol as a club, the size and weight thereof must be shown, in order to show the pistol a deadly weapon. Branch v. State, 33 S. W. 356, 357, 35 Tex. Cr. R. 304. It is a matter within the common knowledge of men that almost any kind of a pistol, if loaded and fired at a person within about 40 feet, is capable of inflicting a serious wound. Mazzotte v. Territory (Ariz.) 71 Pac. 911, 912.

A pistol is a deadly weapon, from the use of which malice may be implied. Kennedy v. State, 5 South. 300-302, 85 Ala. 326.

The term deadly weapons, within the meaning of a statute prohibiting the carrying of such weapons, includes a pistol, although it is not loaded. State v. Bollis, 19 South. 99, 100, 73 Miss. 57.

In a prosecution for aggravated assault and battery, the jury, after retirement, came into court and asked the following question: "Is a pistol necessarily a deadly weapon—the size not known, and not known whether empty or loaded?" Defendant was charged with having struck the prosecuting witness with a pistol, and there was no evidence as to its size or weight. The court answered, without restriction, that a pistol was a deadly weapon. On appeal it was said that "a deadly weapon is defined as one likely to produce death or great bodily injury. A pistol used to strike with is nothing more than a piece of iron of the same size, weight, and shape. There may be pistols so small that they would not, when so used, produce death or serious bodily injury. The indictment alleged this pistol to be a deadly weapon, but the evidence did not show its size or weight. The instruction that those facts were immaterial was error." Skidmore v. State, 43 Tex. 93, 97.

An indictment for aggravated assault, charging that the weapon used was a pistol used as a bludgeon, does not preclude the idea that the assault was with a deadly weapon. State v. Franklin, 36 Tex. 155, 156.

A pistol is not necessarily a "deadly weapon." In an indictment for an aggravated assault with a deadly weapon, the character of the weapon used must be alleged, and on the trial proved. Key v. State, 12 Tex. App. 506.

Sledge hammer.

The term "deadly weapon," as used in Gen. St. c. 29, art. 4, § 2, imposing a punishment on any person who shall willfully and maliciously cut, strike, or stab another with a knife, sword, or other "deadly weapon," etc., includes a sledge hammer. Philpot v. Commonwealth, 6 S. W. 455, 456, 86 Ky. 595.

Stone.

A deadly weapon is a weapon with which death may be easily and readily produced; anything, no matter what it is, whether it is made for the purpose of destroying animal life, or whether it was not made by man at all, or whether it was made by him for some other purpose, if it is a weapon, or if it is a thing with which death can be easily and readily produced, the law recognizes it as a deadly weapon. Thus a stone may be a deadly weapon. Acers v. United States, 17 Sup. Ct. 91, 92, 164 U. S. 388, 41 L. Ed. 481.

Whip.

The words "deadly or dangerous weapon," in Comp. Laws, § 6678, providing that every person is guilty of participating in a riot if such person carried at the time any species of firearms or "other deadly or dangerous weapon," require that the instrument carried must be what is known as a deadly or dangerous weapon per se, for offense or defense of persons. A driving whip is not, therefore, a deadly or dangerous weapon. State v. Page, 91 N. W. 313, 314, 15 S. D. 613.

DEADWOODS.

See "Dead Blocks;" "Double Deadwoods."

The deadwoods of a car are the fixtures or parts of the cars which come in contact with the goose neck of the tender when being coupled to it. Grannis v. Chicago, St. P. & K. C. R. Co., 46 N. W. 1067, 81 Iowa. 444.

"Deadwood" of a freight car is a wooden block fastened to the end of the car. Fay v. Minneapolis & St. L. Ry. Co., 30 Minn. 231, 232, 15 N. W. 241.

"Deadwoods" is the term used to designate horizontal timbers on the ends of freight cars, beyond which extends the draw-heads of the cars. In coupling, the draw-head yields to the impact of the two cars, and the deadwoods or buffers of the cars coming together arrest the force of the blow. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Boland, 11 South. 667, 96 Ala. 626, 18 L. R. A. 260.

DEAFNESS.

Inability to hear ordinary conversation is deafness, within the meaning of the chapter relating to the deaf, dumb, and blind asylum. Pol. Code Cal 1903, § 2241.

DEAL—DEALING.

See "Mutual Dealings."

Where a bank is authorized by its charter to deal in bills of exchange and discount notes, the word "deal" meant to act between two persons, to have and to do with, and this power extends to all transactions with bills of exchange which are lawful, and considered by the bank as expedient to enable it to transact its business or increase its profits. Branch Bank of Alabama v. Knox, 1 Ala. 148, 151.

The taking of goods by the true owner out of the possession, order, or disposition of a bankrupt, after a secret act of bankruptcy, but before the date of the fiat, or the filing of the petition, is "a dealing or transaction with a bankrupt," within 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, providing that all contracts, dealings, and transactions by and with any bankrupt, bona fide entered into before the bankruptcy, shall be deemed valid, notwithstanding any prior act of bankruptcy. Graham v. Barugh, 14 C. B. 134, 138.

Within the meaning of the statute of limitations as relating to the settlement of partnership accounts, "dealing" embraces any act done after the dissolution in winding it up, such as the collection or payment of outstanding debts due to or by the firm, and even good debts due to the firm, outstanding when the suit is brought. Foster's Curator v. Rison (Va.) 17 Grat. 321, 334; Sandy v. Randall, 20 W. Va. 244, 247.

"Dealing, trading, and trafficking, within the meaning of a statute providing that no person shall trade, deal, and traffic in this state as a peddler, hawker, or petty chapman in any foreign goods, wares, and merchandise, characterizes the act of carrying about and offering such goods for sale." Merriam v. Langdon, 10 Conn. 460, 471.

Business relations implied.

The word "dealing," as used in the rule requiring actual notice of the dissolution of a partnership to persons dealing with a partnership, is merely used as a general term to convey the idea that the person who is entitled to actual notice of dissolution must be one who has had business relations with a firm, by which a credit is raised upon faith of the partnership. Vernon v. Manhattan Co. (N. Y.) 22 Wend. 183, 190 (quoted and approved in Clapp v. Rogers, 12 N. Y. 283, 286; Austin v. Holland, 69 N. Y. 571, 25 Am. Rep. 246; Bouker Contracting Co. v. Scribner, 65 N. Y. Supp. 444, 446, 52 App. Div. 505). "Dealing," as used in reference to dealing with a partnership so as to require notice of its dissolution, is a general term, intended to convey the idea that the person who is entitled to actual notice of the dissolution must be one who has had business relations with the firm by which a credit is raised on the faith of the copartnership. Tobin v. McKinney, 84 N. W. 228, 230, 14 S. D. 52, 91 Am. St. Rep. 688. See, also, Rose v. Coffield, 53 Md. 18, 26, 36 Am. Rep. 389.

Within the rule as to notice on dissolution of partnership, dealing need not be confined to any particular sort of transaction, but may include any transaction within the ordinary scope of the business of the firm, in the course of which one who deals with the firm is induced to act on a faith and belief well founded that certain individuals compose the firm, and are bound by the contracts made in the firm name, within the scope of its ordinary business. One who so deals has the right to expect the firm will not be dissolved by the retirement of a solvent member without notice to him. Jansen v. Grimshaw, 26 Ill. App. 287, 292.

As buy or sell as a business.

The term "dealing in goods" implies not only selling, but buying to sell, as an avocation or business. Saunders v. Russell, 78 Tenn. (10 Lea) 293, 297.

In the charter of a bank, declaring that the bank shall not deal in articles, or goods, wares, and merchandise, in any manner whatever, unless it be to secure a debt due to said bank incurred by the regular transactions of the same, the word "deal" means to buy and sell for the purpose of gain, or the taking or receiving of goods, wares, and merchandise to be sold for the owner for a profit or commission. Bates v. Bank of Alabama, 2 Ala. 451, 466.

Where a corporation by its charter was prohibited from dealing in commercial paper, such prohibition must be construed to mean the buying and selling of such paper; and hence the fact that the corporation received and sold notes given for the sale of its lands, for which sale it was incorporated, did not constitute a dealing in commercial paper, within such prohibition, so as to render the corporation guilty of a violation of its franchises. Buckley v. Briggs, 30 Mo. 452, 454.

Act Cong. April 10, 1816, c. 44, incorporating the Bank of the United States, and providing that it shall not directly or indirectly deal or trade in anything except bills of exchange, gold or silver bullion, or in the sale of goods really and truly pledged for money loaned, and not redeemed in due time, did not intend to prohibit purchases generally, but prohibited buying and selling for the purposes of gain. It meant to interdict the bank from doing the ordinary business of a trader or merchant in buying and selling goods for profit, and the words "deal" and "trade" were used in contradistinction to purchases made for the accommodation or use of the bank, or resulting from its ordinary banking operations. Fleckner v. United States Bank, 21 U. S. (8 Wheat.) 338, 351, 5 L. Ed. 631. The charter of a bank of the United States, declaring that it should not directly or indirectly "deal or trade" in anything except bills of exchange, gold or silver bullion, or in the sale of goods really and truly pledged for money loaned, and not redeemed in due time, does not prohibit the corporation from purchasing promissory notes, but only denotes what may or may not be bought and sold by the bank. Bank of United States v. Norton, 10 Ky. (3 A. K. Marsh.) 422, 425.

Sale through agent or intermediary.

"Deal," as applied to intercourse between parties, includes any transaction of any kind between them, so that a liquor dealer who sells liquor to an adult who treats a minor deals with such minor, within the meaning of Rev. St. 1898, § 1557, providing that any keeper of any saloon who shall in any way deal or drink any intoxicating liquors with a minor shall be punished, etc. Nelson v. State, 87 N. W. 235, 237, 111 Wis. 894, 87 Am. St. Rep. 881.

Gen. Laws 1885, c. 296, § 4, making it criminal to "vend, sell, deal, or traffic" in intoxicating liquors, etc., without a license therefor, includes the sale of a keg of beer as an original package by the agent of a brewer; the plain meaning of the words including such sale. Peitz v. State, 82 N. W. 763, 68 Wis. 538.

Single sale.

In a statute providing that any person who shall deal in the selling of distilled spirituous liquors, and in the quantities of 1 pint or more, and less than 20 gallons, shall be deemed a retailer, the word "deal" does not refer to a regular and continued business and employment on the part of the respondent, but a single act of selling constitutes one a retailer, within the statute. State v. Paddock, 24 Vt. 312, 315. Rev. St. c. 83, § 14, provides that any person who shall deal in the selling of foreign or domestic distilled spirituous liquors in a less quantity than 20 gallons at one time shall be deemed to be a retailer, within the meaning of the chapter. Held, that the term "deal" or "dealing," as used in such section, was synonymous with "sell," and that the penalty imposed for unlawfully dealing might be incurred by illegally making a single sale. State v. Chandler, 15 Vt. 425, 430.

St. 1848, prohibiting the dealing in spirituous liquors without a license, should be construed to mean a single act of selling. State v. Bugbee, 22 Vt. 32, 34.

To deal in the selling of a thing is to traffic or trade in the selling of it; to make a business of it. A single act of selling will not constitute a person a merchant. He must deal in the business to be one. State v. Martin, 5 Mo. 361, 363.

A dealer in articles of merchandise, within a statute defining peddlers, is a person making a business of selling such merchandise, and does not include a person engaged in taking orders for merchandise by sample, who made a single sale of the article, and delivered the sample carried by him. In re Houston (U. S.) 47 Fed. 539, 541, 14 L. R. A. 719.

As traffic.

In a complaint charging that a person did sell, deal, or traffic in, for the purpose of evading a certain law, spirituous, ardent, or intoxicating liquors, "deal" is synonymous with and means the same thing as "traffic in." Clifford v. State, 29 Wis. 327, 329.

Dealing in futures.

As a wagering contract, see "Wager." See, also, "Options."

Dealing in futures is the making of wagering contracts in regard to the future market value of stocks, where the customer, if the deal is with a broker, pays and risks something for the purpose of securing a profit from an expected rise in the market value of stocks. Often no actual purchase is contemplated, but settlements are made according to the market rates. Maurer v. King, 59 Pac. 290, 292, 127 Cal. 114.

The phrase "dealing in futures" has acquired the signification of mere speculations on chances, where the grain, cotton, or stock dealt in exist only in imagination, and where no delivery is contemplated, but the parties expect to settle on the difference in the market price. Fortenbury v. State, 1 S. W. 58, 59, 47 Ark. 188.

Dealing in grain.

"Dealing in grain" is not a technical term. Its meaning varies with the place in which it is used. It may mean dealing in grain on hand for present delivery for cash or on credit, or it may mean, also, dealing in futures by means of contracts of sale or purchase for purpose of speculating upon the course of the market. Irwin v. Williar, 4 Sup. Ct. 160, 164, 110 U. S. 499, 28 L. Ed. 225.

Dealing in intoxicating liquors.

The term "dealing in intoxicating liquors" cannot be used to characterize the act of assigning a duebill payable in whisky or wine. Schweyer v. Oberkoetter, 25 Ill. App. 183.

Dealing in stocks.

In the honest exercise of the power to compromise a doubtful debt owing to a bank, its acceptance of stocks with a view to their subsequent sale or conversion into money, so as to make good or reduce an anticipated loss, is not a transaction amounting to a dealing in stocks. First Nat. Bank v. National Exchange Bank, 92 U. S. 122, 128, 23 L. Ed. 679.

Dealing together.

"Dealing together," as used in the statute of 1804 authorizing a set-off if two or more persons dealing together be indebted upon bill, bond, etc., is synonymous with "mutually indebted," as used in the statute of 1818 providing that if two or more persons be mutually indebted to each by judgments, etc., one debt may be set off against the other. Pate v. Gray (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 1291, 1292.

DEALER.

See "Foreign Dealer"; "Free Dealer"; "Ice Dealer"; "Itinerant Dealer or Trader"; "Lumber Dealer"; "Produce Dealer"; "Regular Dealer"; "Retail Dealer"; "Security Dealer"; "Shop Dealer"; "Wholesale Dealer."

A dealer is not one who buys to keep or makes to sell, but one who buys to sell again. He stands intermediate between the purchaser and the consumer, and depends for his profits not on the labor he bestows on his commodities, but on the skill and foresight with which he watches the market. Commonwealth v. Brinton, 3 Pa. Dist. R. 783, 784; Norris v. Commonwealth, 27 Pa. (3 Casey) 494, 496; City of New Orleans v. Le Blanc, 34 La. Ann. 596, 597; Commonwealth v. Hiller, 7 Pa. Dist. R. 471, 472.

A dealer is one who buys to sell to others at a profit. In re Delaware & H. Canal Co.'s Case, 8 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 496, 497.

A dealer is one who makes successive sales as a business. Overall v. Bezeau, 37 Mich. 506, 507.

Acts 1881, c. 149, § 4, requiring a privilege tax from dealers in live stock, means persons who both buy and sell such stock, and does not include a person who buys such stock, but does not sell the same. Saunders v. Russell, 78 Tenn. (10 Lea) 293, 297.

A dealer is one who habitually engages in a course of dealing, so that a merchant who sometimes takes lumber or shingles in payment of a debt, or in exchange for goods kept by him for sale, is not a lumber dealer, within the revenue law. State v. Barnes, 35 S. E. 605, 606, 128 N. C. 1063.

The statute of 1846 relating to the punishment of a dealer in spirituous liquors without a license does not mean that one should actually do the business in person, or even that it should be done in his presence or by his express command. A merchant who keeps liquors in his store for sale, and clerks to deal it out, in common with other commodities kept for sale, is equally as liable for sales made by such clerks as if made by him in person. It is a dealing by him. State v. Dow, 21 Vt. 484, 487.

A firm drawing an accommodation note made payable to the principal generally, and therefore negotiable, and indorsed to a bank or person as he pleases, makes the firm a dealer with the holder of the note, within the rule requiring actual notice of a dissolution of the firm to be given to dealers with it. "To deal is to traffic; to transact business; to trade." Vernon v. Manhattan Co. (N. Y.) 17 Wend. 524, 526 (quoting Johnson's Quarto Dict.).

The term "dealer" in the statute requiring all dealers in goods, wares, etc., who keep a store, etc., to take out a license, includes a person engaged in the purchase of hay, either baled or unbaled, which he sells baled to consumers, and which he stores and bales in barns. Dealers are the middlemen between the manufacturer or the producer and the consumer. Commonwealth v. Robb, 14 Pa. Super. Ct. 597, 602.

Where a company that owns and operates mines regularly sells a particular brand of powder exclusively to its own employes for use in its mines, usually at a profit, but sometimes for less than cost, the company is a dealer, and liable to assessment by the mercantile appraiser, under Act April 22, 1846. In re Delaware & H. Canal Co.'s Case, 8 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 496, 497.

Association or club.

A benevolent association which sells, as such, to its members, tickets entitling them. at a picnic, to a glass of beer, is a dealer in malt liquors, within the statute requiring a license for that purpose. United States v. Giller (U. S.) 54 Fed. 656, 658.

Barkeeper synonymous.

The words "dealer" and "keeper" of a barroom are synonymous, and mean the same thing, as used in an indictment charging defendant with being a dealer or keeper of a barroom. Hofheints v. State (Tex.) 74 S. W. 310, 311.

Butcher.

"Dealer," as used in the revenue act of 1879, Schedule B, requiring every dealer who shall buy and sell goods, wares, and merchandise to pay a license tax, does not include a butcher. State v. Yearby, 82 N. C. 561, 33 Am. Rep. 694.

A dealer is one who buys and sells; and, under Laws 1890, c. 11, § 51, imposing an annual license tax on the business of buying and selling fresh meat from offices, stores, etc., in cities and towns, and exempting farmers who kill their own product and sell it, a person who was not a farmer, but who bought the cattle, butchered them, and sold the meat at his store in a town, was liable for the tax. The statute did not necessarily require that the party must buy and sell the meat when in the same state or condition. It intended to tax the business of buying fresh meat and the business of selling fresh meat—either or both—if prosecuted for gain, as a vocation. State v. Carter, 40 S. E. 11, 12, 129 N. C. 560.

Farmer.

"Dealer" is a term of trade, having a distinct and well-known signification, as that of merchant, mariner, or broker. It means one whose business it is to buy and sell; the middleman who stands between the producer and consumer; one who derives his profit from his skill in knowing when to buy and how to sell the products of others. It was so used in Act May 4, 1841 (Purd. Dig. p. 1455), as supplemented by Act April 22, 1846 (Purd. Dig. p. 1456), which imposes a certain tax on dealers in merchandise, or manufacturers who kept a store apart from their manufactory. Hence it would not include a farmer who sells the product of his farms in the public markets of the different towns, and occasionally sells the produce of other farms in his neighborhood. Barton v. Morris (Pa.) 1 Wkly. Notes Cas. 543, 544, 10 Phila. 360.

Manufacturer.

"Dealer," as used in Act 1881, p. 199, § 4, providing the rate of taxation on wholesale liquor dealers, cannot be construed to mean a manufacturer who sells articles manufactured by him; the article being the product of the growth of the state. A manufacturer of whisky or other spirituous liquors, who sells from his place of manufacture in unbroken packages, or as a manufacturer, is not a wholesale dealer in whisky. A dealer is a middleman between the manufacturer or the producer and the consumer. A dealer, in the popular acceptance or sense of the word, is not one who buys to keep or makes to sell, but one who buys to sell again. He stands immediately between the producer and consumer, and depends for his profits not on the labor he bestows on his commodities, but on the skill and foresight with which he watches the markets. Taylor v. Vincent, 80 Tenn. (12 Lea) 282, 285, 47 Am. Rep. 338.

As used in Act April 22, 1846, § 11, subjecting all dealers in goods, wares and merchandise to an annual tax or license fee, dealers are the middlemen between the manufacturer or the producer and the consumer. A dealer, in the popular, and therefore in the statutory, sense of the word, is not one who buys to keep, or makes to sell, but one who buys to sell again. He stands immediately between the producer and the consumer, and depends for his profits, not on the labor he bestows on his commodities, but on the skill and foresight with which he watches the markets. One who buys hides, and manufactures them into leather by the usual process of tanning, and afterwards sells the leather, is not a dealer. Commonwealth v. Campbell, 33 Pa. (9 Casey) 380, 386.

A dealer, in the common acceptance, and therefore in the legal meaning, of the word, is not one who buys to keep, or makes to sell, but one who buys to sell again. One manufacturing ice and selling his product is not a dealer, within Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. art. 5049, subd. 52, imposing a tax on wholesale dealers in ice in cities of a certain population. Egan v. State (Tex.) 68 S. W. 273.

Merchant.

It does not follow, because a merchant is a dealer, that a dealer is also a merchant. A merchant must have a store, stand, or other place where he sells goods. A dealer need not have such store, stand, or place to keep and sell his goods. He may buy and sell without such aids to his business. A merchant is not required to be a purchaser, but a dealer, at common law, is both a buyer and a seller. Kansas City v. Ferd Heim Brewing Co., 73 S. W. 302, 303, 98 Mo. App. 590.

Miller.

Act April 22, 1846, § 11, authorizing the taxation of dealers in goods, wares, and merchandise, applies to a miller who purchases and raises grain on his farm, and retails the flour at other places than his mill. Berks County v. Bertolet, 13 Pa. (1 Harris) 522, 524.

Money lender.

By a "dealer in real property," we understand a person who buys and sells for the purpose of profit. The term does not include one whose business it is to loan money upon notes or bonds and mortgages of real estate. Blunt v. Walker, 11 Wis. 334, 347, 78 Am. Dec. 709.

Pawnbroker.

Code 1892, § 3399, providing that dealers in pistols shall pay a privilege tax of $100, means those who are engaged in the business of buying and selling pistols, and does not include a pawnbroker who takes a pistol as a pledge for the repayment of a loan. Graham v. State, 13 South. 883, 884, 71 Miss. 208.

A pawnbroker who in a solitary instance takes a pistol in pledge for a loan, and sells it for the payment of a debt, is not a dealer in pistols, within the law requiring such a person to take out a privilege tax. Graham v. State, 13 South. 883, 884, 71 Miss. 208.

Physician.

In Code, § 1077, which forbids dealers in intoxicating drinks and liquors to sell or give the same to unmarried minors, knowing them to be such, "dealer" would include a physician who kept on hand intoxicating drinks or liquors for the purpose of sale or profit. State v. McBrayer, 2 S. E. 755, 756, 98 N. O. 619.

Plumber.

A plumber, who, in putting in steam and water heating apparatus, buys the necessary articles and materials from dealers in plumbing materials; works himself, employing other plumbers to help; gets paid by charging for the labor and adding a percentage to the cost of the material; has no place of business but his workshop, and does not do business as a buyer and seller—is not a dealer in goods, wares, and merchandise, within the meaning of the laws imposing mercantile license taxes. He does not buy to sell the articles he uses. He does not sell them in the literal sense, and he only buys them when he has a job of work to do for which he requires them. As between the dealer and himself, he is the consumer. He needs the articles in his business. He puts them in the buildings, putting his own work upon them; but, when they are placed there, they are not in the same shape as when he received them, but as a compact whole, composing all the materials required for the purpose, no matter from what source he obtained them. Commonwealth v. Gormly, 34 Atl. 282, 173 Pa. 586.

One making a single sale.

"Dealer," as used in the United States revenue laws, requiring a dealer in certain commodities to have a license, means one making a plurality of sales. A single sale of all the merchandise which a person has on hand, who is going out of a business formerly carried on by him, does not constitute him a dealer. A single sale, if accompanied by evidence of a preparation and readiness by the vendor to make other sales, constitutes him a dealer. Goodwin v. Clark, 65 Me. 280, 284.

A dealer is one who makes successive sales as a business. One owning certain property, and selling it in one lot, is not a dealer. Overall v. Bezeau, 37 Mich. 506, 507.

Dealer in drugs.

Rev. Code 1855, p. 1077, prohibiting merchants from selling intoxicating liquors in less quantities than one gallon, but allowing a dealer in drugs and medicines to sell liquors in any quantity, when it is used only for medicinal purposes, means a merchant engaged principally in selling drugs and medicines, though he may incidentally admit into his store, and may sell, articles not strictly falling under the denomination of drugs and medicines. The term does not include a merchant whose principal dealing was in dry goods, groceries, provisions, etc., although, it being a country store, a small assortment of drugs was kept for the convenience of his customers. State v. Wells, 28 Mo. 565, 566.

Dealer in futures.

"Dealer in futures," as used in Act 1883, c. 106, § 4, fixing a certain tax for dealers in futures, means persons buying and selling cotton, corn, general produce, stocks, bonds, etc., for future delivery for their customers. Memphis Brokerage Ass'n v. Cullen, 79 Tenn. (11 Lea) 75, 77.

Dealer in intoxicating liquor or spirits.

One who engages in the business of procuring from the manufacturers beer by the case, and disposing of it by the bottle, is dealing in liquors; and it can make no difference if it is true that the customers left their orders for specific quantities before the defendant undertook the procurement thereof. The word "dealer" is not confined to one who sells his own property only. If one open a place of business for the purpose of furnishing, to all who may patronize him, liquors in quantities of less than five gallons, he is engaged in the business of a retail liquor dealer, irrespective of the question of the manner or mode in which he procures the liquors from the manufacturers. United States v. Allen (U. S.) 38 Fed. 736, 737.

"Dealer," as used in Pen. Code, art. 186, providing for the punishment of dealers in spirituous liquors for selling such liquors on Sunday, cannot be construed to include one who has made but a single sale. Archer v. State, 10 Tex. App. 482, 483.

"Liquor dealers," as used in the Constitution, giving the General Assembly power to tax liquor dealers, the term is employed in a generic sense, and includes all kinds and classes. There may be different classes and varieties included under the general description of "liquor dealers," and it is competent for the General Assembly to classify the different kinds of liquor dealers included within the description as used in the Constitution. Timm v. Harrison, 109 Ill. 593, 601; Dennehy v. City of Chicago, 11 N. E. 227, 229, 120 Ill. 627.

Since the passage of the act of December 24, 1890 (1 Acts 1890-91, p. 128), rendering it unlawful to sell spirituous liquors in any quantity whatever without first obtaining a license, the phrase "dealers in spirituous liquors," when used in a statute, comprehends all persons who sell such liquors in any quantity. Consequently the fifteenth clause of the second section of the general tax act of 1892 is to be construed as imposing the tax therein specified upon dealers who sell by wholesale, in the original packages, corn whisky of their own manufacture, in this state, the same as upon other dealers of such liquors. Fincannon v. State, 21 S. E. 53, 93 Ga. 413.

A distiller or rectifier is not a dealer in spirits, within 6 Geo. IV, c. 80, § 124, prohibiting any dealer in spirits from sending out or selling spirits of a certain grade. Wetherell v. Jones, 3 Barn. & Adol. 221.

Making a single sale of a stock of liquors in gross does not constitute the seller a dealer, or enable the buyer to resist payment of his note for the price on the ground that the seller has not paid a tax to the state as a dealer. Overall v. Bezeau, 37 Mich. 506, 507.

Dealer in secondhand goods.

The term "dealer in secondhand goods," in a statute requiring dealers in secondhand goods to pay a license tax, includes a bicycle dealer who sells secondhand bicycles procured in trade, or which have been used in a bicycle livery and school maintained by him, even though he also sells new bicycles. Lasley v. District of Columbia, 14 App. D. C. 407.

The keeper of every shop where old metals are bought and sold is a dealer in such metals, within Rev. St. c. 102, § 29, providing that suitable persons may be licensed to be dealers in secondhand articles; and where they purchase old gold and silver articles at their shops, and send them away to be refined, every such purchase is a deal, and the purchasers are traffickers or dealers in old gold or silver. Commonwealth v. Hood, 68 N. E. 722, 723, 183 Mass. 196.

Dealer in tobacco.

As the word is used in the revenue law, a dealer in tobacco is a person whose usual business, occupation, employment, or vocation is to deal in tobacco—in other words, who is a tobacconist. It is not, however, every one who sells tobacco that is required to take out a license, but only dealers in tobacco, as the term is thus defined. Carter v. State, 44 Ala. 29.

DEALERS' TALK.

The term "dealers' talk" means the puffing of goods by their owners to induce the sale thereof. "The law recognizes the fact that men will naturally overstate the value and quality of the articles which they have to sell. All men know this, and a buyer has no right to rely upon such statements." Kimball v. Bangs, 11 N. E. 113, 114, 144 Mass. 321.

"Dealing talk" is a term used to designate the puffing of goods, etc., in transactions for the sale thereof. It "is not regarded, in law, as fraudulent, unless accompanied by some artifice to deceive the purchaser and throw him off his guard, or some concealment of intrinsic defects, not easily discoverable by reasonable care and diligence." Reynolds v. Palmer (U. S.) 21 Fed. 433, 435.

DEALT.

The words "played" and "dealt," as used in the chapter punishing gaming, have the meaning attached to them in common language. The word "exhibited" is intended to signify the act of displaying the bank or game for the purpose of obtaining bettors. Pen. Code Tex. 1895, art. 387.

DEAR WIFE.

A devise by a husband to his dear wife, but which does not mention her name, means the individual who answers the description at the date of the will, and not a subsequent wife. "The words 'my dear wife' point to a person then existing, the qualifying adjective necessarily implying affection for an individual; such an affection being inconceivable of a person not then occupying the designated relation." Johnson v. Johnson, 1 Tenn. Ch. 621, 623.

"The destruction of all the senses is death." In re McDaniel's Will, 25 Ky. (2 J. J. Marsh.) 331, 338.

Death is the opposite of life. It is the termination of life. There must be a living child before its death can be produced. It is not the destruction of the foetus, the interruption of that process by which the human race is propagated and continued, that is punished by the statute as manslaughter, but it is causing the death of a living child. Evans v. People (N. Y.) 1 Cow. Cr. R. 494, 497; Evans v. People, 49 N. Y. 83, 90.

The father of a minor who was employed as a switchman of a railroad company entered into a contract with the company by which he stipulated that he released and forever acquitted the company from all or any claim or liability to him for damages for any injuries sustained by the son. The son was thereafter killed while in the employ of the railway company, and the father brought an action to recover for his death. It was held that, while the words "injury" and "death" were by no means synonymous, yet it was certainly true that, relatively to the father seeking to recover for the lost services of his minor child, it was immaterial whether the tort from which his loss originated was one which occasioned the child physical injury, or one which, by causing his death, brought about the same result; and hence such contract was a bar to the action. New v. Southern R. Co., 42 S. E. 391, 392, 116 Ga. 147, 59 L. R. A. 115.

The word "death," as used in a devise to one person, and, in case of his death, to another, refers to a death in the lifetime of the decedent. Wright v. Charley, 129 Ind. 257, 259, 28 N. E. 703.

DEBAUCH.

Where, in an action by a husband for the alienation of his wife's affections, the petition alleged that defendant debauched the plaintiff's wife, the word "debauched" should be construed, not as importing corruption of affections and conscience, but as meaning adultery. Wood v. Mathews, 47 Iowa, 409, 410.

The words "seduce and debauch," in their common, as well as legal, acceptation, mean illicit intercourse accomplished by arts, promises, or deception. State v. Curran, 49 N. W. 1006, 1007, 51 Iowa, 112.

As carnally know.

Debauch means to carnally know. State v. Wheeler, 18 S. W. 924, 925, 108 Mo. 658.

The debauching of a woman, within the meaning of the statute making it criminal to seduce and debauch any unmarried female, etc., is the carnal knowledge of her. A female may indeed be debauched without being seduced, or seduced without being debauched. Putman v. State, 16 S. W. 97, 29 Tex. App. 454, 25 Am. St. Rep. 738 (citing State v. Reeves, 97 Mo. 668, 10 S. W. 841, 10 Am. St. Rep. 349).

The words "seduce and debauch," in the statement in an indictment that defendant unlawfully and feloniously did seduce and debauch a woman named, necessarily charged the offense of seduction. They import the idea of illicit intercourse, accomplished by arts, promises, or deception, and have no other meaning. The use of the phrase "carnally know" is not essential to charge the offense, for the reason that the words "seduce and debauch" include the same meaning. State v. Whalen, 68 N. W. 554, 555, 98 Iowa, 862 (citing State v. Curran, 51 Iowa, 113, 49 N. W. 1006).

Seduce distinguished.

Under Rev. St. § 1259, providing that "if any person shall, under promise of marriage, seduce and debauch any unmarried female of good repute," etc., there are two steps necessary to be taken to consummate the crime: First, the female must be "seduced"; that is, corrupted, deceived, drawn aside from the path of virtue which she was pursuing. Her affections must be gained, and her mind and thoughts polluted. Second, in order to complete the offense, she must be "debauched"—that is, she must be carnally known—before the guilty agent becomes amenable to human laws. Thus it will be seen that a female may be "seduced" without being "debauched," or "debauched" without being "seduced." State v. Reeves, 10 S. W. 841, 845, 97 Mo. 668, 10 Am. St. Rep. 349.

A demurrer to a complaint was sustained on the assumption that the words "made an indecent assault, and then and there debauched and carnally knew," imported nothing more than the seduction of the plaintiff, for which she could maintain no action. "I have already pointed out the mistake that the party demurring has fallen into, as I suppose, from finding these words exclusively used heretofore in actions for seducing a daughter or a wife, and inferring thereby that they amounted to nothing more than an averment of seduction. And I also apprehend that he has not entirely comprehended the full extent of the meaning of the word 'debauched,' which the plaintiff has used as descriptive of the act or injury done to her, and which, in our ordinary dictionaries, is defined, 'enticed, led astray, vitiated, or corrupted,' but which, especially when used as a legal word, has a more extended signification. The verb 'to debauch' is a word of French origin, compounded of the preposition 'de,' from, and 'bauche,' an old word in use in Brittany, meaning shop, and signifying in its compound sense to entice or draw one away from his work, employment, or duty. Lunier, Dictionnaire des Sciences et des Arts, Paris, 1805. It is in this sense of enticing and corrupting that it came into use in our language, as will be found by reference to one of the earliest authorities for the meaning of English words, Phillip's New World of Words, 1696, where it is defined 'to corrupt one's manners, to make lewd, to mar or spoil,' a sense in which it had been previously used by Ben Jonson and by Shakespeare. Bailey, in his Dictionary, some 20 years after, adds further: 'To seduce and vitiate a woman.' As applied to a woman, the word as thus defined meant merely seduction. But in the folio edition of Bailey (by Scott, 1755) the meaning of the word was extended: 'To seduce and violate a woman.' It is in this two-fold sense that it is used in the law forms, and which it has now fully acquired as a general word. McKenzie in his English Synonyms (London, 1854), defines it to 'ravish, deflower, violate'; and it is used in Worcester, Dict. (Boston, 1847), as an appropriate definition for the word 'constuprate,' from the Latin 'constupro,' meaning to violate. There is authority, therefore, in the legal forms and in the lexicographers, for the use of the word in the sense in which plaintiff has employed it." Koenig v. Nott (N. Y.) 2 Hilt. 323, 329.

DEBENTURE.

A debenture is defined as a writing acknowledging a debt; specifically, an instrument, generally under seal, for the payment of money lent; usually, if not exclusively, used of obligations of corporations or large moneyed copartnerships, issued in a form convenient to be bought and sold as investments. Sometimes a specific fund or property is pledged by the debentures, in which case they are usually termed "mortgage debentures." Barton Nat. Bank v. Atkins, 47 Atl. 176, 180, 72 Vt. 33.

DÉBRIS.

Débris is used in the mining law to designate that superficial deposit on the earth's surface which is movable, as contrasted with the immovable mass that lies below. Stevens v. Williams (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 44.

A debt, according to Webster is that which is due from one person to another, whether money, goods, or services; that which one person is bound to pay to another or to perform for his benefit; that of which payment is liable to be exacted; due; obligation; liability. Cook v. Bartholomew, 22 Atl. 444, 445, 60 Conn. 24, 13 L. R. A. 452 (citing Webst. Dict.); Warner v. Warner (N. Y.) 18 Abb. N. C. 151, 155; Rodman v. Munson (N. Y.) 13 Barb. 188, 189 (citing Webster in Sen. Doc. 1851); Equitable Life Ins. Co. of Iowa v. Board of Equalization, 37 N. W. 141, 142, 74 Iowa, 178; Harris v. People, 7 N. Y. (3 Seld.) 9, 124.

In common parlance the word "debt" is sometimes used to denote any kind of just demand, and has been differently defined, owing to the subject-matter of the statute in which it has been used, and while ordinarily it imports a sum of money arising upon a contract, express or implied, in its more general sense it means that which one person is bound to pay to or perform for another. Barber v. City of East Dallas, 18 S. W. 438, 439, 83 Tex. 147.

The word "debt" includes any sort of obligation to pay money. Chalmers v. Sheehy, 64 Pac. 709, 712, 132 Cal. 459, 84 Am. St. Rep. 62; In re Lambie's Estate, 54 N. W. 173, 174, 94 Mich. 489; Latimer v. Veader, 46 N. Y. Supp. 823, 829, 20 App. Div. 418.

A debt is that which one is bound to pay to another, and that the debtor has means with which to pay makes him none the less a debtor until he has paid. Lovejoy v. Inhabitants of Foxcroft, 40 Atl. 141, 147, 91 Me. 367.

A debt is a certain sum that is owing from one person to another. Little v. Dryer, 27 N. E. 905, 906, 138 Ill. 272, 32 Am. St. Rep. 140.

"A debt is a sum of money due from one person or party to another." Anthony v. Savage, 3 Pac. 546, 548, 3 Utah, 277; Appeal Tax Court of Baltimore City v. Rice, 50 Md. 302, 316.

"A debt is a legal liability to pay a specific sum of money." Allen v. Dickson (Ala.) 1 Minor, 119, 120.

A debt is defined as any claim for money that one is bound to pay. In re Lambie's Estate, 94 Mich. 489, 491, 54 N. W. 173, 174.

A "debt" is created when one person binds himself to pay money to another. Scott v. City of Davenport, 34 Iowa, 208, 213.

"A debt is an obligation to pay a certain sum of money due from a debtor to his creditor." Johnson v. Hines, 61 Md. 122, 136.

A debt, as defined by the Century Dictionary, is that which is due from one person to another, whether money, goods, or services. State v. Georgia Co., 17 S. E. 10, 11, 112 N. C. 34, 19 L. R. A. 485.

A debt is defined to be in its general sense a specific sum of money, which is due or owing from one person to another, and denotes, not only the obligation of the debtor to pay, but the right of the creditor to receive and enforce payment. Campbell v. City of Indianapolis, 57 N. E. 920, 929, 155 Ind. 186.

The word "debt," as defined by Burrill, is of large import, including not only debts of record or judgments and debts by specialty, but also obligations arising by simple contract to a very wide extent, and in its popular sense includes all that is due to a man under any form of obligation or promise. New Jersey Ins. Co. v. Meeker, 37 N. J. Law (8 Vroom) 282, 300; Daniels v. Palmer, 42 N. W. 855, 857, 41 Minn. 116; In re Brouillard, 40 Atl. 762, 20 R. I. 617.

"Debt," as used in Civ. Code 1895, § 5893, limiting the amount of debt of municipal corporations, is to be taken in its ordinary, natural, common-sense, popular meaning. Constitutions are the result of popular will, and their words are to be understood ordinarily as used in the sense that such words convey to the popular mind. The debt of an individual or corporation or the public, in its usual and popular sense, means the amount for which the individual or corporation or the public would be personally liable, if called upon to discharge the obligation. Epping v. City of Columbus, 43 S. E. 803, 805, 117 Ga. 263.

Rev. St. c. 44, § 10, requires the receiver of a corporation to pay all "debts" due from the corporation, if the funds in his hands shall be sufficient therefor, and that, if not, he shall distribute the same ratably among all the creditors who shall prove their debts. Held, that the term "debts" is not employed in any strict, technical sense, but is to be understood in its popular meaning, as extending to all legal demands actually due and which may be ascertained without the intervention of a jury. Atlas Bank v. Nahant Bank, 44 Mass. (3 Metc.) 581, 582.

"The word 'debt,' even in its broadest signification, implies that the consideration of the obligation of a debtor has been executed on the part of the creditor, and the payment of the debt discharges the obligation." Pettibone v. Toledo, C. & St. L. R. Co., 19 N. E. 337, 340, 148 Mass. 411, 1 L. R. A. 787.

The word "debt" includes any obligation that one is under to another to pay money or other thing of value, which arises the very moment that the obligation is undertaken, and continues until discharged by payment. Park v. Candler, 40 S. E. 523, 528, 114 Ga. 466.

"A debt signifies whatever one owes. There is always some obligation that it shall be paid; but the manner in which or the condition upon which it is to be paid, or the means of coercing payment, do not enter into the definition." Rodman v. Munson (N. Y.) 13 Barb. 188, 197; Dunsmoor v. Furstenfeldt, 26 Pac. 518, 519, 88 Cal. 522, 12 L. R. A. 508, 22 Am. St. Rep. 331.

The word "debts," as used in the charter of a corporation which provided that, in order to insure the safety of debts due from the association, it should be its duty to maintain a special fund in the care of a trustee, etc., was construed as synonymous with the phrase "payments and expenses of every character" in section 18, making it the duty of the corporation to make and enforce assessments "in order to meet all payments and expenses of every character due from the association." In re Penobscot Lumbering Ass'n, 45 Atl. 290, 292, 93 Me. 391.

Code 1871, § 1302, giving to justices of the peace jurisdiction in suits for the recovery of debts, damages, or personal property, embraces every subject of recovery, other than realty. Western Union Tel. Co. v. Sullivan, 12 South. 460, 70 Miss. 447.

Within the meaning of a statute providing that any person who shall sell or dispose of any personal property on which a lien exists, and shall fail to pay the debt secured by the same within 10 days, or shall fail in such time to deposit the amount of such debt with the clerk of court of the county in which the lien debtor resides, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, the word "debt" will include a person who, in selling property, had agreed to deliver cotton in payment of the rent for the use of land. State v. Bardin, 41 S. E. 959, 960, 64 S. C. 206.

The term "debt," as used in the revenue act, "means those unsecured liabilities owing by the person, firm, corporation, or association, assessed to bona fide residents of this state, or firms, associations, or corporations doing business therein; but credits, claims, debts, and demands due, owing, or accruing for or on account of money deposited with savings or loan corporations shall, for the purpose of taxation, be deemed and treated as an interest in the property of such corporations, and shall not be assessed to the creditor or owner thereof. Pol. Code Cal. 1903, § 3617, subd. 6.

The term "debts," as used in the title relating to the revenue, means those liabilities owing by the person, firm, corporation, or association assessed to the bona fide resident of the state, or firms, associations, or corporations doing business therein. Pol. Code Idaho 1901, § 1313, subd. 6.

The word "debts" includes every claim and demand upon which a judgment for a sum of money, or directing the payment of money, could be recovered in an action. Code Civ. Proc. N. Y. 1899, § 2514, subd. 3; Cook v. Woodward (N. Y.) 5 Dem. Sur. 97, 100.

The term "debts," as used in the title on taxation, means those secured or unsecured liabilities owing by a person. Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 2505; Pol. Code Mont. 1895, § 3680, subd. 6.

Administration expenses.

Under a statute making a decedent's land liable for his debts, and providing for the sale thereof to pay so much of the debts as his personal property will not pay, it is held that the expenses of settling his estate, including executors' commissions and counsel fees, are "debts," within the meaning of the statute. Personette v. Johnson, 40 N. J. Eq. (13 Stew.) 173, 178, 179.

In the statute providing for the payment of debts, funeral expenses, and the expenses of administration of the estate of a decedent out of the personal estate, and that the real estate shall also stand chargeable for the debts over and above what the personal estate may be sufficient to pay, the debts referred to are those due by the intestate at his decease, and do not include expenses of administration. So, where the debts of the decedent allowed against the estate have all been paid, such statute does not authorize the sale of real estate for the purpose of paying the expenses of administration. Hollman v. Bennett, 44 Miss. 322, 328, 331.

The term "debts" when used without any words of limitation or qualification in a will in which testator charges certain devises with his debts, is to be construed as not including liabilities arising after the decease, or charges imposed by law as funeral expenses, and charges and costs of administration. Nash v. Ober, 2 App. D. C. 304, 308.

"Debts," as used in a statute requiring an administrator to file an itemized account of the debts of an estate, does not include his expense in carrying on an unauthorized business with the estate property. In re Rose's Estate, 22 Pac. 86, 87, 80 Cal. 166.

Alimony.

As debt founded on contract, see "Debt Founded On Contract."

Alimony is not awarded as a debt, but for the enforcement of a duty growing out of the marital relation, which is not severed by the husband's misconduct. Alimony is not strictly a debt due to the wife, and it is not a debt or liability which the wife can assign, or which can be appropriated for a debt existing prior to the divorce. It is not a debt provable in bankruptcy. Turner v. Turner (U. S.) 108 Fed. 785, 786, 787. See, also, In re Lachemeyer (U. S.) 14 Fed. Cas. 914, 915; In re Nowell (U. S.) 99 Fed. 931, 933; Chase v. Cas. 207 (cited in Lynde v. Lynde, 52 Atl. 694, 699, 702, 64 N. J. Eq. 736, 58 L. R. A. 471). See, however, In re Van Orden (U. S.) 96 Fed. 86, 88, wherein it is held that a claim of a bankrupt's divorced wife for unpaid monthly installments of the alimony awarded her is a provable debt.

The claim of the wife for alimony is not in the nature of a debt, and she is not a creditor of the husband. Daniels v. Lindley, 44 Iowa, 567, 569.

In Romaine v. Chauncey, 129 N. Y. 566, 29 N. E. 826, 14 L. R. A. 712, 26 Am. St. Rep. 544, it is said that alimony is not strictly a debt due to the wife, but rather a general duty of support, made specific and measured by the court, and hence cannot be seized for payment of wife's debts. Locke v. Locke, 24 N. Y. Supp. 1129, 1130, 71 Hun, 363, 366.

It is the well-settled law of this country that a decree or order for alimony in a divorce proceeding is not a "debt," within the meaning of that term as used in Const. art. 1, § 17, prohibiting imprisonment for debt. In re Cave, 66 Pac. 425, 426, 26 Wash. 213, 90 Am. St. Rep. 736. See, also, Kaderabek v. Kaderabek, 2 O. C. D. 236, 237, 3 Ohio Cir. Ct. R. 419.

"Debt," as used in Gen. St. c. 124, § 5, prescribing the proper mode of serving an execution issued for "debt or damages" in a civil action, except in actions for tort, cannot be construed to include the allowance of alimony, or the award to the wife of her own or a part of the husband's estate on granting a divorce. Chase v. Ingalls, 97 Mass. 524, 530.

Allowance to widow.

The allowance to a widow and minor children is a debt of the estate, and under the statute has preference over all others, except funeral expenses, etc. Watts v. Watts, 38 Ohio St. 480, 491.

Section 82 of the administrative act (Swan & C. St. pp. 580, 581) classifies the allowance of a sum of money to the widow and child of the decedent among the debts of the deceased. A certain deed of a decedent was decreed by the court to be void as to creditors, and subjected to the payment of the debts of the estate and the costs of administration. Held, that the allowance to the support of the widow and child was a debt of the estate, for the payment of which resort might be had to such land or its proceeds. Allen v. Allen's Adm'r, 18 Ohio St. 234, 236.

Under a will declaring that, "out of the proceeds of my property directed to be sold, my funeral and all other debts I desire to be first paid, including the expenses for the support and maintenance of my family from the time of my death until the division of my estate," the claim of the widow for the support and maintenance of herself and family until the division of the estate is not one of the debts which can be paid under the statute relating to insolvent estates, but is a legacy, the payment of which is postponed to the payment of the debts. Prince v. Prince, 47 Ala. 283, 288, 289.

Antenuptial obligation.

"Debt," as used in a clause in a will directing the payment of testator's debts, includes a debt due from the husband to his surviving wife by virtue of an antenuptial contract. Warner v. Warner (N. Y.) 18 Abb. N. C. 151, 155.

Balance in bank.

The term "debt," however technically correct, is not colloquially or familiarly applied to a balance at a banking house. Parker v. Marchant, 1 Younge & C. Ch. 290, 300.

Bond.

"Debts," as used in Acts 1862-63, declaring that United States notes issued under the loan and currency act shall be lawful money and a legal tender for the payment of debts, means obligations for the payment of money, which does not include a bond obligating the defendant to repay the principal sum borrowed in gold and silver coin; such obligation not being a debt, but an obligation to deliver a particular chattel described. Bronson v. Rodes, 74 U. S. (7 Wall.) 229, 250, 19 L. Ed. 141.

"Debts," as used in Legal Tender Act U. S. Feb. 25, 1862, providing that ordinary debts may be satisfied by the tender of United States notes, means obligations for the payment of money in which the medium of payment is not specified, and does not authorize a tender of United States notes in payment of a contract payable in American gold dollars; such a contract being a contract for the delivery of specific chattels, and not a negotiable instrument payable in money of the realm. McGoon v. Shirk, 54 Ill. 408, 5 Am. Rep. 122.

"Debt," as used in a will fixing the commission of the executor for collecting testator's debts, includes the interest-bearing obligations of the United States which were owned by testator. In re Tilden (N. Y.) 44 Hun. 441, 444. See In re Tilden (N. Y.) 5 Dem. Sur. 230, 233.

"Debts due," as used in Pub. St. c. 11, § 4, authorizing the taxation of debts due the persons to be taxed, includes railroad bonds. Hale v. Hampshire County Com'r, 137 Mass. 111, 115.

As chattel or property.

See "Chattel"; "Personal Property"; "Property."

Claim synonymous.

Bankr. Act, § 19, provides that all debts due and all debts existing, but not yet payable, are provable against the estate, makes provision for contingent debts and liabilities of various sorts, and declares that all demands against the bankrupt for or on account of any goods or chattels wrongfully taken or withheld by him may be proved and allowed as debts. Section 83 declares that debts arising from fraud, embezzlement, or a breach of trust may be proved, and are entitled to a dividend. Held, that the word "debt" is synonymous with the word "claim" in both sections, and will embrace claims arising from debts created by fraud, so that a debt for fraud, which was presented for allowance and defendant's dividend made thereon, was saved from discharge as to the balance by section 83. Stokes v. Mason, 10 R. I. 261, 263.

"Debt," as used in Comp. Laws, § 4095, which authorizes an attachment when it appears "that the debt was incurred for property obtained under false pretenses," should be construed to be synonymous with the term "claim," as used in the first subdivision, requiring the affidavit in attachment to contain a statement of the claim, specifying the amount and grounds thereof. Coats v. Arthur, 58 N. W. 675, 676, 5 S. D. 274.

"Debt," as used in Civ. Code, § 2461, providing that a partner authorized to act in liquidation might collect, compromise, or release any debts due the partnership, and pay or compromise any claims against it, is synonymous with "claim." While the word "debt" in its legal sense does not, like the word "claim," include a demand for damages arising from a tort, it is apparent that the word was used in this connection to avoid repetition, and that the term "debt" was intended to have an application as broad as the term "claim." Berson v. Ewing, 23 Pac. 1112, 1114, 84 Cal. 89.

Gen. Laws, c. 274, § 28, provides that any claims growing out of trover or replevin, or any tort, may be proved against an insolvent; and section 50 enacts that a discharge in insolvency shall release an insolvent from "all his provable debts." Held, that provable debts include all claims against the insolvent which may be proved under section 28; the word "debts" evidently being used in its generic, and not in its strict legal, sense. In other words, "debts" means claims. In re Brouillard, 40 Atl. 762, 20 R. I. 617.

In a judgment entered against an estate, requiring its payment to be made in preference to all other debts, the word "debts" is not used synonymously with "claims," and claims for funeral expenses and expenses of administration both have priority over debts, of whatsoever character they may be. Williams v. Robinson, 56 Tex. 347, 351.

Claim distinguished.

A claim upon the United States is something in the nature of a demand for damages arising out of some alleged act or omission of the government, not yet provided for or acknowledged by law. The term imports something asked or demanded on the one hand, and not admitted or allowed on the other. When the demand is admitted, authorized, or provided for by law, it is not a mere claim, but a debt. Dowell v. Cardwell (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 990, 994.

Compensation for appropriation of private property.

While the appropriation of private property for public use is accomplished, not by contract, but by force, yet the just compensation which the Constitution prescribes shall be allowed, when fixed by the proper authorities, becomes a debt, and, being so, the Constitution of the United States restrains the state from enforcing its payment in anything but gold and silver. State v. Beackmo (Ind.) 8 Blackf. 246, 250.

An order of the city council, upon laying out a street, that a certain sum be paid as damages to a party over whose land the street is laid out, does not constitute a debt due from the city, and hence does not make the city liable as trustee of such party under the statute regulating trustee process. Fel- lows v. Duncan, 54 Mass. (13 Metc.) 332, 333, 334.

Damages to which a landowner is entitled for the taking of his land for the alteration of a highway are not a debt for which he is taxable before such damages have become fixed and receivable. Lowell v. Boston Street Com'rs, 106 Mass. 540, 541.

The word "debt," as used in Act April 13, 1899, annexing the territory of East Dallas to the city of Dallas, and providing that the latter shall pay all the lawful debts of the former, "is used in a general sense, and its evident meaning is to include all obligations to pay money, whether arising from contract or implied by law as a compensation for damages for property taken, damaged, or destroyed for or applied to public use." Barber v. City of East Dallas, 18 S. W. 438, 439, 83 Tex. 147.

Conditional, uncertain, contingent, or future obligation.

A debt is understood to be an unconditional promise to pay a fixed sum at some specified time, and is quite different from a contract to be performed in the future, dependent upon a condition precedent, which may never be performed, and which cannot ripen into a debt until performed. Saleno v. City of Neosho, 80 S. W. 190, 192, 127 Mo. 627, 27 L. R. A. 769, 48 Am. St. Rep. 653.

To constitute a debt within the attachment laws, the sum must be certainly and at all events payable; but, whenever it is uncertain whether anything will ever be demandable by virtue of the contract, it cannot be called a debt. Per Sedgwick, J. Wentworth v. Whittemore, 1 Mass. 471, 473.

A claim for uncertain and unliquidated damages is not a debt. This is the settled doctrine of the courts of law, and the same rule prevails in equity. Jackson v. Bell, 31 N. J. Eq. (4 Stew.) 554, 558 (citing Duncan v. Lyon [N. Y.] 3 Johns. Ch. 351, 8 Am. Dec. 513).

"Debts," as used in the revenue law (St. 1861, p. 419, § 5), providing for the assessment of debts, should be construed to include not only debts due and payable on or before the 1st day of December of the year for which an assessment is made, but debts to become due and payable at any time thereafter. "Standing alone, the word 'debt' is as applicable to a sum of money which has been promised at a future day as to a sum now due and payable. If we wish to distinguish between the two, we say of the former that it is a debt owing, and of the latter that it is a debt due. In other words, debts are of two kinds: solvendum in present, and solvendum in futuro. Whether a claim or demand is a debt or not is in no respect determined by reference to the time of payment. A sum of money which is in all events payable is a debt, without regard to the fact whether it be payable now or at a future time. A sum payable upon a contingency, however, is not a debt, or does not become a debt until the contingency has happened." People v. Arguello, 37 Cal. 524, 525.

Where a statute detaching certain territory from a county provided that it should be liable for its pro rata share of the debts of the county from which it was taken, it did not mean contingent liabilities arising from a breach of duty. Askew v. Hale County, 54 Ala. 639, 644, 25 Am. Rep. 730.

"Debts," as used in the bankruptcy act, declaring that all persons, being merchants, etc., owing debts to the amount of not less than a certain sum, shall be liable to become bankrupts, and may, on the petition of one or more of their creditors, to whom they owe debts amounting in the whole to not less than a certain sum, should be construed to include debts not yet due, as well as those due; for a debt is not less owing because it is not yet due. Ex parte Tower, 1 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 8, 9.

Uncertain and contingent demands are included within the word "debt" in Bankr. Act 1841, c. 9, § 1, providing that all persons owing debts may take the benefit of the act by declaring, among other things, that they are unable to meet their debts and engagements, and, in section 4, that, having conformed to the requirements of the statute, the bankrupt shall be entitled to a full discharge from all his debts. Fowles v. Treadwell, 24 Me. (11 Shep.) 377, 381.

"Debts," within the meaning of the rule of evidence that a voluntary gift by one owing debts and insolvent will be presumed to be fraudulent as to his creditors, can only be construed to mean present debts, and does not include the liability of an accommodation indorser before the indorsed note matures. Severs v. Dodson, 34 Atl. 7, 8, 53 N. J. Eq. (8 Dick.) 633, 51 Am. St. Rep. 641.

The liability of a bankrupt indorser of commercial paper, which did not become absolute until after the filing of the petition, is a "debt" within Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 63, 30 Stat. 562 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3447], which enumerates debts on contracts, expressed or implied, among those provable in bankruptcy. Moch v. Market St. Nat. Bank (U. S.) 107 Fed. 897, 898, 47 O. C. A. 49; In re Gerson, Id.

Within the meaning of Pub. St. c. 201, § 42, providing that a petition of the creditors in insolvency proceedings must show that the debtor is owing $300 or more, and that his property within the state not exempt from attachment is in their belief insufficient to pay his debts, the word "debts" embraces all debts, as well those that are not, as those that are, presently payable. Hinds v. Heath, 38 Atl. 382, 68 N. H. 551.

The term "debt" means "a fixed and certain obligation to pay money or some other valuable thing or things, either in the present or in the future." Appeal of City of Erie, 91 Pa. 398, 402.

"Debt," as used in Act June 16, 1836, § 35, authorizing the attachment of a debt due a judgment debtor, "is of very broad application, and embraces many obligations which, in strict speech, are not debts. A contract to pay money at a future day is not strictly a debt until the day of payment arrives, although it is called 'debitum in presenti, solvendum in futuro,' and is undoubtedly attachable. When the condition is performed, which in this case is by mere lapse of time, it will be a strict debt." In re Glen Iron Works (U. S.) 20 Fed. 674, 680.

"Debts," as used in a statute making officers of a corporation personally liable for debts contracted during the time in which the corporation is in default in making certain reports, does not include the liability on a contract for the purchase of lumber, which is not to be delivered according to the terms of the contract until after the corporation has made such report. Garrison v. Howe, 17 N. Y. 458, 465.

Act Feb. 17, 1848, providing that every company organized thereunder should make a certain annual report, and that, if any company shall fail to do so, the trustees should be jointly and severally liable for all debts of the company then existing and all that should be contracted before such report should be made. A manufacturing corporation by resolution appointed one its general agent and attorney, agreeing to pay him a salary of $1,000 a year, to commence on the 6th day of that month, besides expenses; but no time was fixed when the salary was to become due and payable. Held, that the company did not create a debt, within the statute, when they adopted the resolution, nor did they contract a debt for the agent's services as they were rendered; the word "debt," in the statute, meaning debts existing or contracted, and not liabilities which might ultimately ripen into debts. Oviatt v. Hughes (N. Y.) 41 Barb. 541, 545.

The term "debt" in Pub. St. c. 155, §§ 11, 12, providing that, upon the failure of a manufacturing corporation to file a statement of its condition on or before the 15th day of February in each year, the stockholders shall be liable for any debt then existing, does not include a sum to be due on a contract for the purchase of goods to be delivered in November; the payment not to be made until the goods are delivered. Wing v. Slater, 35 Atl. 302, 304, 19 R. L. 597, 33 L. R. A. 566.

"Debts," as used in Comp. Laws 1857, § 1821, declaring that on the neglect or refusal of the directors of a manufacturing company to comply with certain provisions of law regarding the filing of their articles of association, or filing an annual report, the directors shall be jointly and severally liable for all debts of the corporation contracted during the period of such neglect or refusal. Held, that the word "debts," as used in the statute, meant "present debts," and liabilities which may give causes of action against the company and result in judgment against it are not embraced in the provision. Lockhart v. Van Alstyne, 31 Mich. 76, 78, 18 Am. Rep. 156.

The words "debts or demands," in a statute requiring all debts or demands of whatsoever nature against the estate of testator or intestate to be exhibited in two years, includes debts not due. Fillyau v. Lavery, 3 Fla. 72, 107.

Act. Feb. 24, 1834, § 24, declares that no debts of a decedent not secured by mortgage or judgment shall remain a lien on his lands after his death longer than five years, unless an action for their recovery be commenced within that period, or a statement of the debt, if it is not payable within that period, be filed in the office of the prothonotary. Held, that a "debt," within the meaning of the word as used in the act, means a debt existing at the time of decedent's death, and does not include a claim for services thereafter rendered and expenses incurred in the settlement of the estate. In re Emerick's Estate, 33 Atl. 550, 551, 172 Pa. 181.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1778, provides that in an action against a foreign or domestic corporation to recover damages for the nonpayment of a note or other evidence of debt for the absolute payment of money on demand or at a particular time, an order of a judge shall be served with the summons, directing trial of the issues raised. Held, that the term "evidence of debt for the absolute payment of money" meant a debt which was absolutely payable without any contingency, and hence a policy of life insurance was not such a debt, notwithstanding the fact that the policy had become due by the death of the insured, since by the terms of the policy it is itself payable, not absolutely, but conditionally, and it is none the less a conditional contract because ultimately there may grow out of it an absolute liability. New York Life Ins. Co. v. Universal Life Ins. Co., 88 N. Y. 424, 428.

Laws 1848, c. 40, § 12, provides that the trustees of a corporation shall be individually liable for all the debts of the company existing or contracted during the time that they are in default in the filing of a certain report required by them to be made. Held that, if there is no obligation giving a person a present right of action against the company, there is no debt or duty which can be demanded under the statute as a penalty against the trustees. There is no debt, within the meaning of the statute, if the time of payment has not arrived. Consequently, where an indebtedness of a company fell due during the time its trustees were in default for not making a report, for which notes were given, which were renewed, and an action was commenced against the trustees to enforce the statutory liability prior to the maturity of a portion of the renewed notes, the plaintiff was only entitled to recovery on the notes due at the time of the commencement of the action. Folger, J., dissenting. Jones v. Barlow, 62 N. Y. 202, 205.

The word "debt," as used in Rev. St. art. 3203, requiring actions for debt not evidenced by written contract to be brought within two years, is not restricted to its technical or common-law meaning, but includes any open, unliquidated claim for money. Hence the sum shown to be due by a street improvement certificate issued by a city against an abutting lot owner is a debt. O'Connor v. Koch, 29 S. W. 400, 401, 9 Tex. Civ. App. 586.

A claim for damages against insolvent manufacturers for loss of prospective profits on goods which might thereafter have been manufactured and supplied under a contract, or on goods manufactured and on hand, but not delivered, at the time of the assignment, is not a debt provable against the assigned estate, but merely a claim for unascertained damages. In re Adams (N. Y.) 12 Daly, 454, 457.

A debt is not created by a city when the people by an election consent that the council may issue the bonds, nor when the council by ordinance provides for the issue of the bonds, nor even when the bonds have been prepared, signed, and sealed, but not sold or delivered. All this might have been done, and yet, if the bonds had not been sold or delivered to a purchaser, the city would have owed nothing. City of Austin v. Valle (Tex.) 71 S. W. 414, 416.

The claim which an insane asylum has against a patient who has been supported in it is not strictly speaking a debt. It is true it is a charge provided by law against the estate of the lunatic, not against him, to be enforced in rem in the contingency and only when prescribed by the statute. Central Kentucky Asylum v. Penick, 102 Ky. 533, 44 S. W. 92. So that Ky. St. § 1707, allowing the homestead of a decedent to be sold to pay his debts, does not apply to such a claim. Holburn v. Pfannmiller's Adm'r, 71 S. W. 940, 941, 24 Ky. Law Rep. 1613.

Corporate stock.

In considering the question whether, in the distribution of the moneys remaining in the treasury in the Centennial Board of Finance at the close of the affairs of that corporation, the appropriation to that corporation of $1,500,000 made by Congress in Act Feb. 18, 1876, should be paid into the treasury of the United States before any division of assets was made among stockholders, the act providing that the United States is to be paid out of the moneys that remain in the treasury of the company after the payment of the debts, the court said: "The liability of a corporation to its stockholders on account of their stock is not a debt. The shares of a stockholder represent his proportion of the property of a corporation, and upon the winding up of its affairs the assets remaining after all liabilities are discharged are for division among the stockholders, according to their respective interests. The payment to stockholders upon such a division is for a dividend of the property divided, and not for a debt owing by the corporation." Eyster v. Centennial Board of Finance, 94 U. S. 500, 502, 24 L. Ed. 188.

The value of stock in a national bank, owed by a taxpayer, must be considered a part of the debts due or to become due him from which he is entitled to deduct the amount of his bona fide and unconditional indebtedness, in listing his property for taxation, under subdivision 10, § 1038, Rev. St. Ruggles v. City of Fond du Lac, 10 N. W. 565, 566, 58 Wis. 436.

Costs.

A judgment against the plaintiff for costs in an action for a tort is a debt, within the meaning of exemption laws. Lane v. Baker (Pa.) 2 Grant, Cas. 424.

A judgment for costs, recovered by a sheriff in an action against him for not returning an execution, is a debt provable under the bankruptcy act, and therefore reached by a discharge. Graham v. Pierson (N. Y.) 6 Hill, 247.

The term "debt," as used in the constitutional provision forbidding imprisonment for debt, is used in a broad sense, and will embrace such obligations to pay money as arise upon the law, as well as those which arise upon contract, and will include the liability of a guardian to pay the costs adjudged in an action against an infant plaintiff. Granholm v. Sweigle, 57 N. W. 509, 510, 3 N. D. 476.

A debt is that which is due from one person to another, and under Code Civ. Proc. § 2749, providing that real estate of a decedent may be sold for the payment of his debts, and sections 2756, 2757, providing that a judgment against a personal representative for a debt due from decedent is deemed a debt of decedent, but that the same shall be allowed, as against his real property, at no greater sum than the amount recovered, exclusive of costs, a judgment for costs in an action against decedent, continued against his personal representative, is not a debt of the decedent. In re Foley, 57 N. Y. Supp. 131, 132, 39 App. Div. 248.

Where the persons among whom an estate was divided gave a bond to the administrator that they would pay all debts, dues, demands, and claims now "due or to grow due," such language included legal costs and charges against the estate afterwards incurred in the settlement of said estate. Springsteen v. Samson, 32 N. Y. 703, 707.

"Debt," as used in Laws 1848, p. 54, § 12, making the trustees of a corporation personally liable for the debts of the corporation in case of default on their part in filing an annual report as required by law, meant not only a sum of money due by certain and express agreement, but whatever the law orders any one to pay; and hence a judgment for costs was within the statute. Andrews v. Murray (N. Y.) 9 Abb. Prac. 8, 14.

"Debts," as used in Pamph. Acts, c. 64, § 1, approved April 23, 1873, relating to property exempted from sale for the payment of "debts," should be construed to include the costs adjudged in a civil suit. Clingman v. Kemp, 57 Ala. 195, 196.

The word "debt," as used in a constitutional prohibition against imprisonment for debt, does not include the costs in a criminal case. Caldwell v. State, 55 Ala. 133, 135; Morgan v. State, 47 Ala. 34, 36; In re Boyd, 9 Pac. 240, 243, 34 Kan. 570; Bailey v. State, 6 South. 898, 899, 87 Ala. 44. Contra, see Thompson v. State, 16 Ind. 516, 517.

Credit distinguished.

See "Credits."

As debt owing by intestate.

The word "debts," as used in Rev. St. 1889, § 184, making it the duty of an administrator to pay all debts, including taxes due, means debts due by the intestate at his death, and applies only to debts which the intestate owed. Langston v. Canterbury, 73 S. W. 151, 154, 173 Mo. 122.

Demand distinguished.

See "Demand."

As dues.

The word "debt," as used in a statute making stockholders liable for the debts unpaid of a corporation, is not a broader expression than "dues," as used in the Constitution, which secures dues from a corporation by additional stockholders' liability.

Ward v. Joslin (U. S.) 105 Fed. 224, 227, 44 C. C. A. 456.

As duty.

"Debt," in its broad sense, means duty, as used in Rev. Laws, § 1967, providing that each mortgagor and mortgagee of chattels shall make affidavit that the mortgage is made for no other purpose than securing the debt specified in the conditions thereof, etc., and includes the duty which the maker of a promissory note owes to the indorser of such notes to save him from a payment thereof. Gilbert v. Vall, 14 Atl. 542, 544, 60 Vt. 261.

Equitable or moral obligation.

"The word 'debt' is not always used in the same sense; that is, it does not always import a legal obligation on the part of one to pay another something due him. It often implies a mere moral or equitable obligation, as well as a strictly legal one." Scott v. Neeves, 45 N. W. 421, 423, 77 Wis. 305.

"Debts," as used in Rev. St. § 5067, allowing proof in bankruptcy proceedings of all debts due and payable from the bankrupt, etc., includes debts which are only provable in equity, as well as debts provable at law. It includes a claim for an account of profits against an infringer of a patent right. In re Boston & Fairhaven Iron Works (U. S.) 29 Fed. 783, 784.

The term "debt," as used in a statute relating to estates of deceased persons, is not limited to such as are strictly legal debts, but manifestly includes every demand by a creditor, whether recoverable at law or in equity; and such will be held to be its meaning in a bond of a legatee conditioned for the faithful discharge of all the just debts and obligations of the deceased, and will not be limited to a fixed and determinate sum due from one person to another. Snyder v. State, 40 Pac. 441, 5 Wyo. 318, 63 Am. St. Rep. 60.

"Debts," as used in 2 Rev. St. p. 116, § 18, and Id. p. 95, § 78, authorizing the surrogate to decree the payment of debts, legacies, and distributive shares out of decedent's estate, on the application of a creditor, legatee, or next of kin, and making it the imperative duty of the surrogate to determine on a final accounting all the questions concerning any debt, claim, legacy, bequest, or distributive share, should not be limited to such as are strictly legal debts, but manifestly comprehends every claim and demand by a creditor, whether recoverable at law or in equity; in other words, it includes equitable as well as legal debts, and hence the claim of a surviving partner for a balance due him from his deceased copartner is a debt. Babcock v. Lillis (N. Y.) 4 Bradf. Sur. 218, 219; Sellis' Case (N. Y.) 4 Abb. Prac. 272, 273.

Fare of passenger.

"Debts," as used in Act Cong. Feb. 23, 1863, declaring that United States notes shall be lawful money, and a legal tender for all debts, public and private, will be construed to include the fare of a passenger on a railroad train. Lewis v. New York Cent. R. Co. (N. Y.) 49 Barb. 330.

Fine.

A fine is not a debt, for the nonpayment of which a person may be imprisoned. In re McDonald, 33 Pac. 18, 20, 4 Wyo. 150; State v. Mace, 5 Md. 337, 351; McCool v. State, 23 Ind. 127, 132; Ex parte Robertson, 11 S. W. 669, 670, 27 Tex. App. 628, 11 Am. St. Rep. 207.

Bankr. Act 1867, § 19, provided that all debts due and payable from the bankrupt might be proved against the estate, and that all demands against him for or on account of any goods wrongfully taken or withheld might be proved or allowed as debts. Held, that the word "debt" was used in the legal or limited sense, and not in a popular sense, but as meaning a sum of money due by certain and express agreement; and hence a judgment for a fine was not a debt provable in bankruptcy. In re Sutherland (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 456, 457.

Under a provision of the Constitution exempting a homestead from sale under execution or other process "issued on any demand for any debt contracted," a fine imposed by statute for the violation of the law cannot in any just sense be designated as a debt contracted. The ordinary meaning of the word "debt" is a sum of money due to another by contract, and a "debt contracted" necessarily means that the debtor has come under a voluntary obligation to pay it. The relation of debtor and creditor implies that the one has given credit to the other by contract. It would be a solecism to observe and say that the fine imposed as a punishment for a penal offense was a debt contracted. Contracted how? Contracted with whom? A debt contracted implies the voluntary action of debtor and creditor on a valuable consideration. This cannot be predicated upon a fine imposed by mere punishment. The very essence of a contract is taken away when the amount is assessed as a penalty for violating law and claimed as a punishment for crime. Whiteacre v. Rector (Va.) 20 Grat. 714, 715, 716, 26 Am. Rep. 420.

A fine or penalty incurred by a breach of an ordinance of the corporation of Washington is a debt, and recoverable at common law as such. Ex parte Reed (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 404, 407.

The Court of Appeals of Virginia has decided that a fine imposed by a criminal court of the state is a debt or demand due the state. In re Shaner (U. S.) 39 Fed. 869.

Judgments for pecuniary fines are debts due the state, within the meaning of the law authorizing the sale of lands without valuation; and lands surrendered to obtain the discharge of the body seized in execution are to be sold in the same manner as if levied upon by the sheriff in the first instance. Walsh's Lessee v. Ringer, 2 Ohio (2 Ham.) 327, 333, 15 Am. Dec. 555.

A fine imposed upon a party by the court of chancery for the willful violation of an injunction is not a debt, so as to be affected by discharge in bankruptcy. Spalding v. People (N. Y.) 7 Hill, 301; Spalding v. New York, 45 U. S. (4 How.) 21, 24, 11 L. Ed. 858.

Funeral expenses.

The term "debt," used in reference to the estate of a deceased person, cannot be construed to include funeral expenses; for they are not a debt, but properly a charge on the estate, and payable in preference to debts. Gregory v. Hooker's Admr., 8 N. C. 394, 397, 402, 9 Am. Dec. 646.

A will bequeathed all of the testator's property to his wife, and provided that, if at her death anything should be left after all her just debts were paid, it should be divided between his children. It was held that, while in a restricted sense the word "debts" would embrace only obligations resulting from the widow's contracts, the word is not used in such restricted sense in the will; it being evidently his intention that, should the income of his estate prove insufficient for his wife's support, she should have recourse to the principal. He may be presumed to have contemplated, and to have thus provided for, her decent interment after her decease, and therefore included the necessary expense of such interment in the phrase "all her just debts," so that the estate is chargeable with the funeral expenses of the widow. Smith v. Gilliatt, 49 N. Y. Supp. 614, 22 Misc. Rep. 246.

Gift distinguished.

There is a distinction between gifts and debts in the law of collation. Thus the obligation of a son to collate for the value of slaves given to him by his parents does not constitute a debt. Succession of Meyer, 11 South. 532, 535, 44 La. Ann. 871.

Indivisibility.

A debt is an entire thing, though payable by installments. Bosler v. Kuhn (Pa.) 8 Watts & S. 183, 186.

Interest.

Interest is to be regarded as incidental to the debt. Principal is always debt, and the debt. Interest is accessory to or incident to the principal. The principal is a fixed sum. The accessory is a constantly accruing one. The former is the basis or substance from which the latter arises, and on which it rests. Howe v. Bradley, 19 Me. (1 App.) 31, 36. Interest on the principal debt is not, within the meaning of the Constitution, a part of the debt until it is due, and is not within the constitutional limitation. Epping v. City of Columbus, 43 S. E. 803, 808, 117 Ga. 263.

The word "debt," in a statute providing that receipt and acceptance by a mortgagee of one-half of the fine imposed upon the mortgagor of personalty as a punishment for fraudulently selling the mortgaged property operates to extinguish the debt to secure which the mortgage was executed, embraces the interest, as well as the principal. Conley v. Maher, 20 S. E. 647, 648, 93 Ga. 781.

Acts 1838, c. 163, § 6, relating to insolvents, directs the debtor, on the first meeting of creditors, to deliver to his assignees a schedule of his creditors and the sums due to them and the consideration for each debt. Held, that the word "debts," in the statute, is used in its broadest sense, and not only includes all accruing interest on contracts carrying interest on the face of them, but the interest which by law is allowed on all other claims and demands which are due and unpaid. Brown v. Lamb, 47 Mass. (6 Metc.) 203, 210.

"Debts, dues, and demands," as the terms are used in a discharge of all debts, dues, and demands, includes a special promise to pay the interest upon an assigned note. Howel v. Seaman (Conn.) 1 Root, 383.

Judgment.

Under a statute making debts due a bankrupt assignable by commissioners, it is held that the term "debts" includes any judgment recovered by the bankrupt and remaining unsatisfied. Sullivan v. Bridge, 1 Mass. 511, 514.

A judgment is a debt, and the extinguishment of a simple contract debt and its merger into the higher debt does not in terms nor by implication discharge the liability of the trustee. McHarg v. Eastman, 30 N. Y. Super. Ct. (7 Rob.) 137, 140, 141.

Rev. St. U. S. § 5067, declares that unliquidated damages arising out of any contract or agreement on account of any goods and chattels wrongfully taken, converted, or withheld, as well as debts due or to become due, are provable against the bankrupt's estate. Held, that the word "debts," as used in such section, is synonymous with "claims," and therefore includes a judgment of a court in a civil action between individuals existing against the bankrupt at the time his petition in bankruptcy was filed, whether the cause of action on which the judgment was founded arose out of a tort or on contract. Howland v. Carson, 28 Ohio St. 625, 628.

The word "debt," in a statute making the trustees of a manufacturing company who neglect to file a certain annual report liable for debts of the company, means the debt contracted by the corporation, and not the judgment which a creditor may have recovered against the corporation; and hence a trustee who was not such at the time the debt was due is not liable, under the statute, because of the corporation's liability on a judgment subsequently recovered and unpaid during his incumbency. McHarg v. Eastman (N. Y.) 35 How. Prac. 205, 207.

The word "debts," as used in the statute making the trustees of a corporation jointly and severally liable for all the debts thereof because of the failure of the trustees to make and file within the specified time the annual report required by law, includes a judgment of record rendered against the corporation organized under the manufacturing laws. Lewis v. Armstrong (N. Y.) 8 Abb. N. C. 385, 389.

Judgment in bastardy proceedings.

There is no distinction, under the bankrupt law, between a judgment in an action arising ex delicto and a judgment in an action arising ex contractu. They are both debts, within the meaning of the law, and both provable against the estate of the bankrupt; and the decision of this question is not affected by the fact that in the action ex delicto it is adjudged by the court, and certified upon the execution, that the cause of action arose from the willful and malicious act or neglect of the party. In re Comstock (U. S.) 22 Vt. 642, 6 Fed. Cas. 237.

The word "debt," as found in a bankruptcy act, was used in its legal and limited sense, and not in its popular and enlarged signification. Thus, some demands, although in the form of judgments, are held not to be "debts" within the meaning of that term as used in the acts; and others, though within the letter, are held not to be within the spirit, of those laws. Thus, under the act of 1867, a judgment for a fine was held not to be a debt provable in bankruptcy. Under such rule a judgment in a bastardy proceeding for the maintenance of a child is not a debt. In re Baker (U. S.) 96 Fed. 954, 956.

Judgment for taxes.

The term "debt" is not confined to obligations for the payment of money arising on contract, but means an obligation or legal liability to pay a certain sum, without regard to how that liability arises, whether it be imposed by law without contract, or imposed by the obligations of a contract. A judgment which is personal against the taxpayer and in rem against real estate is a "debt," within the act of Congress which makes certain United States notes a legal tender for debts. Taxes are not debts within the act of Congress referred to; but, if the state goes into court and obtains a judgment for those taxes against the person of the taxpayer, the personal judgment becomes a debt. Rhodes v. O'Farrell, 2 Nev. 60, 61.

Judgment for tort.

The phrase "any debt," as used in Const. art. 10, exempting a homestead from sale under execution issued on a judgment for any debt, embraces a judgment in an action ex delicto. Dellinger v. Tweed, 66 N. C. 206, 210.

The statute, in providing that the homestead shall not be liable for forced sale for any debt, not only means debts arising on contract, but applies to a judgment rendered in an action of tort. Smith v. Omans, 17 Wis. 395, 397.

"Debt," as used in Const. art. 16, § 2, providing that every homestead shall be exempt from forced sale on execution or any other final process from a court for any debts contracted, etc., is one of large import, and includes all kinds of claims, arising not only on contract but also in tort. Thus the word would include a debt of record or judgment founded in tort. Mertz v. Berry, 59 N. W. 445, 446, 101 Mich. 32, 24 L. R. A. 789, 45 Am. St. Rep. 379.

Under the homestead act, exempting the homestead from a sale on execution for the satisfaction of any debt, the homestead cannot be sold under an execution based on a judgment rendered in an action ex delicto. Dellinger v. Tweed, 66 N. C. 206, 210; Gill v. Edwards, 87 N. C. 76.

"Debt," as used in Bill of Rights, § 16, providing that there shall be no imprisonment for debt, except in cases of fraud, should be construed as meaning a cause of action ex contractu, and not ex delicto. A judgment for damages arising ex delicto is not transformed into a debt, so as to prevent the debtor's imprisonment. Moore v. Green, 73 N. C. 394, 396, 21 Am. Rep. 470; Long v. McLean, 88 N. C. 3, 4.

A judgment recovered for a tort is a debt, and will be the basis for attachment proceedings as much as if it was recovered upon a contract. Johnson v. Butler, 2 Iowa (2 Clarke) 535, 545.

As the bankrupt law makes no exceptions as to debts, except those of a fiduciary character, the discharge is from all other debts, and includes a judgment in a court of law obtained in an action of tort. In re Book (U. S.) 3 Fed. Cas. 867, 868.

The Illinois statute concerning discharge from imprisonment for debt (Rev. St. c. 72), providing by section 30, as amended by Act June 14, 1887, that no person shall be discharged under the act who neglects or refuses to schedule his property as thereby required, applies to defendant's imprisonment under execution upon judgment for tort, as well as upon judgments for debt, since a judgment for tort becomes a debt in such sense as to be embraced in the statutory provision concerning imprisonment for a debt. Stroheim v. Deimel (U. S.) 77 Fed. 802, 806, 23 C. C. A. 467.

Legacy.

A will provided that, as soon as convenient after testator's decease, all his debts and funeral expenses be paid out of his means. Certain legacies were thereafter provided, and in the eighth item of the will it was provided: "After all debts and expenses are paid, give the balance left in equal sums to the Foreign and Home Boards of Missions of the Presbyterian Church." It was held that the debts and expenses mentioned in the eighth item referred to the legacies previously given, and therefore the will was consistent with itself. Stebbins v. Stebbins, 49 N. W. 294, 296, 86 Mich. 474.

A will provided for the payment of specific legacies in the form of annuities, payable every three months. In another provision it was declared that the rents of the estate should be paid every month, and kept three months and all debts paid out of them, and the balance kept to the end of the year and divided among the heirs. The will required the payment of all testator's debts before such fund came into existence. Held, that the specific legacies were not inconsistent with the provision requiring the rents to be divided among the heirs, as the testator intended by the use of the word "debt" to include the quarterly payments to the legatees. Angus v. Noble, 46 Atl. 278, 280, 73 Conn. 56.

The word "debt," as used in Ky. St. § 2219, providing that partial payments on interest-bearing debts shall be first applied to the reduction of accrued interest, was intended to include every interest-bearing obligation or demand, and includes a specific legacy. Morton's Ex'r v. Trustees of Church Home for Females and Infirmary for Sick, 70 S. W. 841, 24 Ky. Law Rep. 1122.

As legal obligation.

The word "debt," as used in the law of garnishment, includes only legal debts—causes of action upon which the defendant in the attachment, under the common-law practice, can maintain an action of debt or indebitatus assumpsit, and not mere equity claims. Hassie v. God Is With Us Congregation, 35 Cal. 385, 386; Redondo Beach Co. v. Brewer, 101 Cal. 322, 325, 35 Pac. 896, 897.

As liability.

See "Liability."

Liability for breach of contract.

Strictly speaking a debt is a precise sum due by express agreement. As used in a statute permitting attachment for debts, it would include any demand arising out of a contract, though such demand be for damages for breach thereof. Stiff v. Fisher, 21 S. W. 291, 292, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 346.

A debt, secured or unsecured, is a liquidated demand for a sum of money due by a certain and express agreement, or, in other words, a sum of money reduced to a certainty, as distinguished from a claim for uncertain damages. Thus, a refusal of a railroad company to honor its contracts of carriage renders it liable in damages, but until such unliquidated claims could be reduced to judgment they would in no legal sense constitute a debt outstanding against it. Tompkins v. Augusta Southern R. Co 30 S. E. 992, 995, 102 Ga. 436.

A debt is a demand for a certain sum, or sum actually ascertained. In order to constitute a debt, the liability must be fixed and certain, and an unliquidated demand or liability does not constitute a debt. The term "debt" is used in this sense in the law relating to assignments for the benefit of creditors, so that a bill for damages for breach of contract by the assignor will be a claimant's loss. Possible profit accruing after the assignment is not provable as a debt against the estate, when an insolvent assigned for the benefit of creditors. In re Adams (N. Y.) 15 Abb. N. C. 61, 65.

"Debts," as used in a statute requiring corporations to file statements of debts, does not include liabilities which will ultimately ripen into debts, and hence does not include unliquidated claims for breaches of contract. Victory Webb Printing & Folding Mach. Mfg. Co. v. Beecher (N. Y.) 26 Hun, 48, 52.

Gen. St. p. 920, § 72, provides that the assets of an insolvent corporation shall be collected and sold, and the proceeds divided among the creditors in proportion to the amount of their respective debts. Held, that the term "debt" is not used in any restricted sense, and includes a claim sounding in unliquidated damages. Rosenbaum v. United States Credit System Co., 40 Atl. 591, 593, 61 N. J. Law, 543.

The term "debt" does not apply to a warranty of the soundness of a negro, which is rather a contract of which the consideration is the purchase price paid for the slave. Lyons v. Stephens, 45 Ga. 141, 143.

A liability upon breach of warranty is a "debt," within the meaning of the statute which provides for suits against stockholders, in the event of dissolution of a corporation. Dryden v. Kellogg, 2 Mo. App. 87, 94.

As used in Rev. St. art. 3203, § 4, providing that actions for debt, where the indebtedness is not evidenced by a contract in writing, are barred if not commenced within two years after accruing, the word "debt" would include damages by reason of the loss or waste of a grain crop, caused by the failure of a harvester to work as represented by the seller. Wood Mowing & Reaping Mach. Co. v. Hancock, 23 S. W. 384, 385, 4 Tex. Civ. App. 302.

Liability for corporate debts.

St. 1838, c. 163, providing that all debts due and payable from an insolvent debtor may be provable in the insolvency proceedings against him, cannot be construed to include the qualified liability of a member of a manufacturing corporation for the "debts" of such corporation. Kelton v. Phillips, 44 Mass. (3 Metc.) 61, 62.

The statutory liability of a director or a stockholder of a corporation is not a debt, within the meaning of the law relating to insolvency or bankruptcy; it being a statutory, and not a contractual, liability. Old Colony Boot & Shoe Co. v. Parker-Sampson-Adams Co., 67 N. E. 870, 871, 183 Mass. 557.

Liability for desertion.

"Debt," as used in Act Cong. March 16, 1802, § 23, providing that no noncommissioned officer, musician, or private shall be arrested or taken in execution for any debt under a certain sum, contracted before enlistment, nor for any debt contracted after enlistment, should be construed in its common acceptance as meaning a debt created by contract between the soldier and any other individual, and does not extend to a soldier committed by an alderman for want of security to appear to answer a charge of having deserted his wife and family and left them a charge on the guardians of the poor. Commonwealth v. Keeper of Jail of Philadelphia (Pa.) 4 Serg. & R. 505, 506.

Liability for infringement of patent.

Liability for things done which are independent of contracts cannot be construed a debt or contract; and hence, the infringement of a patent being essentially wrong, independent of a contract, liability therefor is not a debt or contract for which the officers of a corporation are liable. Child v. Boston & Fairhaven Iron Works, 137 Mass. 516, 521, 50 Am. Rep. 328.

Liability for official neglect.

A claim arising out of the official neglect of the clerk of a county court in Virginia, against the officer, a nonresident of Virginia at the time the claim was asserted, is not a claim for debt for which a foreign attachment in chancery would lie under a statute authorizing such proceedings against absent debtors. Dunlop v. Keith (Va.) 1 Leigh, 430, 19 Am. Dec. 755.

Liability for tort.

A verdict for the plaintiff in an action for tort will not convert the cause of action into a debt. Such a cause of action will not constitute a debt till judgment is rendered on it. Therefore a defendant against whom a verdict has been rendered for a tort is not subject to trustee process in an action against a plaintiff before judgment is rendered on such verdict. Thayer v. Southwick, 74 Mass. (8 Gray) 229.

A liability for tort which has not been converted into a judgment is not a debt, within the bankruptcy act. Crouch v. Gridley (N. Y.) 6 Hill, 250.

In Esmond v. Bullard (N. Y.) 16 Hun, 65, it was held that, under the bankruptcy act and other statutes which expressly relate to the proving or payment of debt, a tort was not, strictly speaking, a debt. The court, after citing this case, held that a person who was entitled to recover for a tort was a creditor, within the meaning of the statute making a transfer of the property of a corporation void as to creditors when made in contemplation of insolvency. Munson v. Genesee Iron & Brass Works, 56 N. Y. Supp. 139, 148, 37 App. Div. 203.

"Debt," as used in Laws 1848, c. 40, § 12, providing that the trustees of a manufacturing corporation shall in certain cases be liable for all the debts of the company then existing and for all that shall be contracted, does not include the liability for a tort; for it does not grow out of a contract. Esmond v. Bullard (N. Y.) 16 Hun, 65, 68.

"Debt," as used in a statute authorizing an attachment for debt, does not include a claim arising in tort. Day v. Bennett, 18 N. J. Law (3 Har.) 287, 288; Holcomb v. Town of Winchester, 52 Conn. 447, 448, 52 Am. Rep. 609; Finlay v. Bryson, 84 Mo. 664, 668; Sunday Mirror Co. v. Galvin, 55 Mo. App. 412, 418, 419; El Paso Nat. Bank v. Fuchs, 34 S. W. 206, 207, 89 Tex. 197.

"Debt," as used in a statute making void all fraudulent conveyances to avoid the debt or duty of others, does not comprehend claims founded on torts. In common speech, a debt or duty is never applied to a mere legal liability to an action for a tort in which the party may be subjected to pay damages, to be ascertained by the verdict of a jury. Fox v. Hills, 1 Conn. 295, 299.

"A debt is in law an obligation to pay money, and the obligation may arise ex contractu or ex delicto. The obligation may be express ex contractu, or implied quasi ex contractu. It may arise ex delicto on actual tort, or quasi ex delicto on what the law chooses to treat as a tort, and thus it is plain that a debt or obligation may be contracted as well through a tort committed as a bargain entered into." In re Radway (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 154, 162.

A claim for damages for a wrongful act, which demand was unliquidated, is not a debt, and cannot become so until it has been prosecuted to judgment. The claimant had only the disputed claim, not based upon or growing out of a contract, and cannot be considered a creditor. He has a claim for redress, but no debt. Hill v. Bowman, 35 Mich. 191, 192.

A claim for damages in an action for slander and malicious prosecution does not become a debt until included in a judgment; hence, where a claimant had recovered a verdict on such a claim at the time the defendant in the action was adjudged a bankrupt, but judgment had not then been entered, the amount of the judgment or claim was not a debt which could be proved against the bankrupt's estate. Zimmer v. Schleeauf, 115 Mass. 52, 53.

"Debt" is defined to be "a sum of money due by certain and express agreement." Consequently a right of action for a tort is not a debt, and does not come within the provision of Const. art. 11, § 2, providing that "nothing contained in this Constitution shall impair the validity of any debts," etc. Parker v. Savage, 74 Tenn. (6 Lea) 406, 408.

A statute giving foreign administrators a right to sue for the recovery of debts due to decedents (Gen. St. Ky. c. 39, art. 2, § 43) confers no capacity to sue for the wrongful death of such decedent; a claim for tort, not reduced to judgment, not being a debt. In Gray v. Bennett, 44 Mass. (3 Metc.) 522, 526, in defining the legal meaning of the term "debt," the court said: "The word 'debt' is of large import, and includes, not only debts of record or judgment and debts of specialty, but also obligations arising under simple contracts to a very wide extent, and in its popular sense includes all that is due to a man under any form of obligation or promise." In Dunlop v. Keith (Va.) 1 Leigh, 430, 19 Am. Dec. 755, a claim for the official neglect of a county clerk was held not to be a debt within the meaning of the statute authorizing an attachment for debt. A claim against a corporation for damages for the negligent loss of a steamboat was held not to be a debt, within the meaning of an act making stockholders liable for all the existing debts of a corporation. Cable v. McCune, 26 Mo. 371, 72 Am. Dec. 214. In Detroit Post & Tribune Co. v. Reilley, 46 Mich. 459, 9 N. W. 492, it was held that a claim for damages sounding in tort was not a debt before it had been prosecuted to judgment. So, also, Maysville Street Railway & Transfer Co. v. Marvin (U.

S.) 59 Fed. 91, 92, 8 C. C. A. 21 (citing Zimmer v. Schleeauf, 115 Mass. 52).

The primary definition of "debt" is a sum of money due by certain and express agreement. It has, however, a much broader popular significance, and includes that which is due from one person to another, whether money, goods, or services; that which one is bound to pay to another or to perform for his benefit. In Dunsmoor v. Furstenfeldt, 88 Cal. 529, 26 Pac. 520, 12 L. R. A. 508, 22 Am. St. Rep. 331, it is said any kind of obligation of one man to pay money to another is a debt. A debt signifies what one owes. There is always some obligation that it shall be paid, but the manner in which it is to be paid or the means of coercing payment do not enter into the definition. And, as used in Act April 15, 1880, giving the State Board of Agriculture control of the State Agricultural Society, and providing that in no event shall the state be liable for any debts created by said board, the term "debt" includes an unliquidated demand arising by implication of law from an injury to a visitor to the fair, due to an act of nonfeasance of the officers of the society. Melvin v. State, 53 Pac. 416, 419, 121 Cal. 16.

"Debts," as used in Gen. St. c. "Corporations," §§ 136, 139, requiring corporations to publish annually a true statement of the existing "debts" of the corporation, means only those obligations arising on express and implied contracts growing out of dealings between the corporations and others, where the financial condition of the corporation would or might be the foundation of credit, and would not include damages for tort. Doolittle v. Marsh, 9 N. W. 54, 11 Neb. 243.

Rev. Code 1845, p. 234, § 18, declares that the stockholders of a corporation shall be jointly and severally liable if the corporation fails to give notice annually of all the existing debts of the corporation. Held, that the words "existing debts" were not synonymous with the word "demands," and did not mean, therefore, a demand against a corporation for damages arising through the negligence of its servants, but were sums of money due by certain or express agreements, according to Blackstone's definition of the term "debt." Cable v. McCune, 26 Mo. 371, 383, 72 Am. Dec. 214; Cable v. Gaty, 34 Mo. 573, 574, 86 Am. Dec. 126.

Under Ky. St. § 2030, providing that a guardian may, with leave of court, compound a debt or demand owing to the ward, the debt or demand does not include an unliquidated claim for damages for a tort on behalf of the ward, so that a settlement of such a claim by the guardian, if made in good faith, is binding on the ward. Manlon v. Ohio Val. Ry. Co., 36 S. W. 530, 531, 99 Ky. 504.

Act Feb. 11, 1775, § 12, providing that if any person shall sue, except before a justice, for any debt or demand, and shall obtain a verdict or judgment which, without costs, shall not exceed a certain amount, he shall recover no costs, includes every species of action, whether founded on contract or tort. White v. Hunt, 6 N. J. Law (1 Halst.) 415, 418.

The word "debt," when used in the statute without some plain or expressed declaration making it applicable thereto, does not include taxes or claims for unliquidated damages. The legal definition of the word is opposed to unliquidated damages, or a liability in the sense of an inchoate or contingent debt, or an obligation not enforceable by ordinary process, so that a statute abolishing imprisonment for debt is inapplicable to cases involving demands for unliquidated damages. Bolden v. Jensen (U. S.) 69 Fed. 745, 746.

The word "debt," as used in Revision 1860, § 2281, includes the liability of a person who has obtained money from another by means of false and fraudulent representations in the sale of a patent right. Whenever a party has derived a pecuniary advantage from a wrong done by him, and the person wronged can waive a tort and maintain an action on contract, the obligation of the wrongdoer to pay is a debt. Warner v. Cammack, 37 Iowa, 642, 644.

As applied to a municipal corporation, "debt," if given its broadest signification, would include, not only obligations for extraordinary expenditures, but every outstanding warrant upon the treasury, the accruing salaries of officers, and expenses daily arising for water supply, street lighting, street repairs, and other like legitimate purposes. Bouvier says that "in an enlarged sense the term denotes any kind of just demand," which latter definition is broad enough to include claims based upon tort, as well as contract. Swanson v. City of Ottumwa, 91 N. W. 1048, 1051, 1052, 118 Iowa, 161, 59 L. R. A. 620 (quoting Bouv. Law Dict.; Jacob, Law Dict.).

Liability for trespass.

A cause of action in trespass is not a "debt," within the contemplation of the bankruptcy act. The fact that a verdict has been rendered does not alter the case. Until judgment on such action, there is no debt which is reached by the discharge. Kellogg v. Schuyler (N. Y.) 2 Denio, 73, 74.

Liability for trover.

The term "debts," as used in Bankr. Act, § 13, giving the commissioners power to assign for the use of the creditors all the debts due to such bankrupt, means all claims founded in property, and is not used in its technical meaning, and hence would embrace a cause of action for trover, etc. Sullivan v. Bridge, 1 Mass. 511, 513.

License fee or tax.

Taxes, debts, dues, and demands due the state, as used in Act March 30, 1871, providing that coupons on state bonds should be receivable for all taxes, debts, dues, and demands due the state, include the "charges or assessments made by law as a condition precedent to obtaining license for pursuing a business or profession." Royall v. Virginia, 6 Sup. Ct. 510, 513, 116 U. S. 572, 29 L. Ed. 735.

As a liquidated demand.

"A debt," says Sir John Cross, in Ex parte Thompson, Mont. & B. 219, "is a demand for a sum certain." In re Assignment of Adams (N. Y.) 67 How. Prac. 284, 286.

A debt is defined as a demand for a certain sum; a sum actually ascertained. That there must be an ascertained debt, and not an unliquidated demand or liability, is sustained by all the cases, legal and equitable. In re Adams (N. Y.) 12 Daly, 454, 457.

In Bac. Abr. tit. "Debt," the term "debt" is defined as an action founded on an express or implied contract, in which the certainty of the sum or duty appears, and therefore "the plaintiff is to recover the same in numero, and not to be repaired in damages by the jury, as in those actions sounding in damages." Watson v. McNairy, 4 Ky. (1 Bibb) 356.

A debt is a money demand, and of a liquidated nature, and one on which an action of debt or indebitatus assumpsit would lie. Lindsay v. King, 23 N. C. 401, 403; Dowling v. Stewart, 4 Ill. (3 Scam.) 193, 195.

"A debt is properly opposed to unliquidated damages and liability for use, in the sense of an inchoate or contingent debt." Commercial Nat. Bank v. Taylor, 19 N. Y. Supp. 533, 535, 64 Hun, 499.

A "debt," technically so called, may be evidenced by record, by contract under seal, or by simple contract only. Its distinguishing feature is that it is for a sum certain, or that it may readily be reduced to a certainty, and the action of debt lies for the recovery thereof, without regard to the manner in which the obligation is incurred or is evidenced. Baum v. Tonkin, 110 Pa. 569, 575, 1 Atl. 535.

Under Pub. St. c. 151, § 2, cl. 11, as amended by St. 1884, c. 285, § 2, authorizing a suit to subject a partner's interest in the firm to the payment of a debt, it is held that where defendant bought an undivided half interest in the partnership, composed of plaintiff and another, for a certain sum, provided plaintiff could buy out his partner, a sum falling due from defendant upon plaintiff's purchase of his partner's interest was a debt, within the statute. Draper v. Hollings, 39 N. E. 793, 794, 163 Mass. 127.

Loan distinguished.

A debt is something quite different from a loan. A loan contracted creates a debt, but there may be a debt created without contracting a loan. A debt may be contracted without resorting to a loan; hence it may be that a corporation may have the power to contract a debt for property which it is authorized to purchase, and not have the power to borrow money or contract a loan. Ketchum v. City of Buffalo (N. Y.) 21 Barb. 294, 305.

Miscarriage distinguished.

In passing upon the meaning of the words "debt, default, and miscarriage," it is said they apply to guaranties for an existing debt, guaranties for future debts, or to some past or future default in duty by a third person. Wood on Frauds, § 114. The word "miscarriage" has a broader meaning than either debt or default, and includes the failure by a third party to succeed in a proposed business, regardless of the fact whether his failure to do so would entitle the plaintiff to an action at law or not. The requirement than an actionable duty shall exist was made first by the court in cases of debt. The same requirement was later extended to default, meaning default in any duty and for the same reason. But the reason does not exist in the case of miscarriage—that is, the act of a third party—and this requirement should not be made. In other words, if any meaning is to be given to the word, it must mean something different or broader than debt or default, and this is the only distinction than can be made. Gansey v. Orr, 73 S. W. 477, 481, 173 Mo. 532.

Mortgage.

Ordinarily the term "debt" imports a sum of money arising on a contract, express or implied. In its more general sense it is defined to be that which is due from one person to another, whether money, goods, or services; that which one person is bound to pay or perform to another. The obligation of a party under a bond and mortgage is a debt, which is payable in legal tender. Kimpton v. Bronson (N. Y.) 45 Barb. 618, 620.

The word "debts," in a provision in a will directing the executors to pay all testator's just debts, includes mortgage debts. Turner v. Laird, 35 Atl. 1124, 1125, 68 Conn. 198.

A charge upon a specific parcel of a person's property for the payment of a sum of money constitutes a debt as fully as a demand which is or may be made a charge upon all his property, and it makes no difference in this respect whether the lien is acquired by express agreement or by operation of law. While it is frequently said that a debt secured by a mortgage is not a debt of a person to whom the land is subsequently sold, yet it is his debt to the extent that his property is liable for its payment. Every lien which may be discharged by the payment of a sum of money is a security for the payment of a debt. In accordance with these views, the act of Congress which makes treasury notes lawful money, and legal tender in payment of debts, refers to the obligation of a judgment creditor or redemptioner to pay a certain amount of money in order to exercise the statutory right to redemption from the sale of land made by the sheriff. People v. Mayhew, 26 Cal. 655, 661.

As used in How. Ann. St. § 6105, as amended in Laws 1889, Act 67, providing that an administrator may borrow money to pay "debts against the estate," the phrase quoted includes a mortgage on testator's land, since the mortgage constituted a lien securing an indebtedness, and the property was charged with the payment of the debt. In re Lambie's Estate, 54 N. W. 173, 174, 94 Mich. 489.

Note.

The term "debt" includes a promissory note before maturity, as well as after. Dodson v. Taylor, 21 Atl. 293, 294, 53 N. J. Law (24 Vroom) 200.

A note given by a city in payment for waterworks material, and payable, with interest, two years after date, is a "debt," within a constitutional provision providing that no debt shall be created by any city, unless at the same time provision be made for its payment; it not being a current expense of the city, within the rule that current expenses are not debts, within the meaning of such provision. City of Terrell v. Dessaint, 9 S. W. 593, 594, 71 Tex. 770.

Rev. St. c. 90, § 83, providing that any person claiming title or interest in attached property may be allowed to dispute the validity and effect of the prior attachments, on the ground that the debt demanded in the first suit was not "justly due" when the action was commenced, cannot be construed to include a note made without the knowledge of the payee, who was liable as a surety for the maker for a debt due, but not paid, against which liability the maker had promised to secure the payee, until assented to by the payee. Baird v. Williams, 36 Mass. (19 Pick.) 381, 383.

A promissory note is not a debt, any more than any other promise is. Hill v. Beebe, 13 N. Y. (3 Kern.) 556, 563.

Obligation synonymous.

"Debt," as used in an affidavit for attachment, which, after stating that defendant was indebted to plaintiff on contract, stated that defendant fraudulently contracted the debt or incurred the obligation, was synonymous with the term "obligation," the obligation and the debt being necessarily the same thing; and therefore the affidavit was not void for uncertainty because of the use of the disjunctive conjunction "or," separating the allegation that defendant fraudulently contracted the debt from the allegation that he fraudulently incurred the obligation. Emerson v. Detroit Steel Spring Co., 58 N. W. 659, 660, 100 Mich. 127.

As an obligation ex contractu.

A debt is a sum of money due by certain and express agreement. It originates in and is founded on contract, express or implied. City of Camden v. Allen, 26 N. J. Law (5 Dutch.) 398, 399; Borough of McKeesport v. Fidler, 23 Atl. 799, 800, 147 Pa. 532; Appeal of City of Erie, 91 Pa. 398, 399; Rodman v. Munson (N. Y.) 13 Barb. 63, 77; Commercial Nat. Bank v. Taylor, 19 N. Y. Supp. 533, 535, 64 Hun. 499; United States Rolling Stock Co. v. Clark, 10 South. 917, 95 Ala. 322; Dickey v. Leonard, 77 Ga. 151, 153; Hampton v. Truckee Canal Co. (U. S.) 19 Fed. 1, 4; Hagar v. Reclamation Dist. No. 108, 4 Sup. Ct. 663, 666, 111 U. S. 701, 28 L. Ed. 569; In re Southerland (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 456, 457; Hyatt v. Vannack, 33 Atl. 972, 973, 82 Md. 465; Appeal Tax Court of Baltimore City v. Rice, 50 Md. 302, 316; McElfresh v. Kirkendall, 36 Iowa, 224, 226; Spilman v. City of Parkersburg, 14 S. E. 279, 282, 35 W. Va. 605; City of Carondelet v. Picot, 38 Mo. 125, 130 (citing Pierce v. City of Boston, 44 Mass. [3 Metc.] 520); Boatman's Sav. Inst. v. Bank of Missouri, 33 Mo. 497, 518, 84 Am. Dec. 61; Heinl v. City of Terre Haute (Ind.) 66 N. E. 450, 452 (citing Quill v. City of Indianapolis, 124 Ind. 292, 23 N. E. 788, 7 L. R. A. 681). It does not depend upon any after calculation to ascertain it. Fisher v. Consequa (U. S.) 9 Fed. Cas. 120, 121. It is not essential to the creation of a debt that the borrower should be liable to be sued therefor. Brown v. City of Corry, 17 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 490, 496. It is a sum of money due by express agreement, either in writing or by parol, where the quantity is fixed and does not depend on future calculation. The nonpayment or nonperformance is an injury for which an action of debt may be brought. Republica v. Le Caze (Pa.) 1 Yeates, 55, 69.

"Debt" means an obligation or legal liability to pay a sum certain, and it makes no difference how that liability arises, whether it be by contract or be imposed by law without contract. Rhodes v. O'Farrell, 2 Nev. 60, 61.

Bouvier defines a "debt" to be a sum of money due by certain and express agreement, and says that debts arise or are proved by matter of record (as judgment debts), by bonds, and by simple contracts, where the amount is fixed and specific, and does not depend on any future valuation to settle it. Burrill gave Mr. Stevens as authority for the proposition that a debt is not a contract, but the result of a contract; and he says that the word "debt" is of large import, and includes debts of record, debts by specialty, and obligations arising under simple contract. Both authors show that in a popular sense the word "debt" may be more, but never less, comprehensive. A promise, then, to pay a certain sum in United States gold coin, is a debt. Milliken v. Sloat, 1 Nev. 585, 590.

"Debt" is defined by the Supreme Court of Massachusetts in Gray v. Bennett, 44 Mass. (3 Metc.) 526, as follows: "The word 'debt' is of large import, including not only debts of record, or judgments, and debts by specialty, but also obligations arising under simple contract. To a very wide extent and in its popular sense it includes all that is due to a man under any form of obligation or promise." Arapahoe County Com'rs v. Fidelity Sav. Ass'n, 71 Pac. 376, 377, 31 Colo. 47.

In Heacock v. Sherman (N. Y.) 14 Wend. 58, the word "debt" was regarded, when used in relation to the liability of a stockholder for the debts and demands of the corporation, as limited to claims arising out of contract. Kelly v. Fourth of July Min. Co., 53 Pac. 959, 972, 21 Mont. 291, 42 L. R. A. 621, 69 Am. St. Rep. 668.

The Constitution, in forbidding municipal corporations creating debts beyond a certain extent, meant any debts created by contract, express or implied; any voluntary incurring of any liability to pay in any manner or for any purpose. Spilman v. City of Parkersburg, 14 S. E. 279, 282, 35 W. Va. 605.

Blackstone says that the legal acceptance of a debt is a sum of money due by certain and express agreement, as by a bond for a determinate sum, a bill or note, a special bargain, or a rent reserved on a lease, where the quantity is fixed and specific, and does not depend on any subsequent valuation to settle it. Davenport v. Kleinschmidt, 13 Pac. 249, 257, 6 Mont. 502; Solis v. Blank, 49 Atl. 302, 303, 199 Pa. 600.

"The legal acceptance of debt is a sum of money due by certain and express agreement, as by a bond for a determinate sum, a bill or note, a special bargain, or a rent reserved on a lease, where the quantity is fixed and specified. Powell v. Oregonian Ry. Co. (U. S.) 36 Fed. 726, 730 (quoting 3 Bl. Comm. 154).

The word "debt" is defined to be whatever one owes; a liquidated demand; a sum of money due by certain and expressed agreement. In its most general sense, that which is due from one person to another, whether money, goods, or services; that which one is bound to pay or perform for another; a fixed and certain obligation to pay money, or some other valuable thing, in the present or in the future. Coats v. Arthur, 58 N. W. 675, 682, 5 S. D. 274 (citing And. Law Dict. p. 315); Wilcoxon v. City of Bluffton, 54 N. E. 110, 115, 153 Ind. 267; Haris v. Larsen, 66 Pac. 782, 24 Utah, 139.

"A debt is money due upon a contract, without reference to the question of the remedy for its collection." City of Baltimore v. Gill, 31 Md. 375, 390.

The word "debt," when used in regard to the substitution of one debtor for another debtor, who is also his creditor, imports a sum of money arising on contract, and not a mere claim for damages, so that, where a person merely promises to advance money to another, he did not thereby become his creditor. Rietzloff v. Glover, 64 N. W. 208, 91 Wis. 65.

A debt, in its more general sense, is a specified sum of money which is due or owing from one person to another, and denotes, not only the obligation of the debtor to pay, but also the right of the creditor to receive and enforce payment. Rap. & L. Law Dict. tit. "Debt." It is essential to the idea of a debt that an obligation must have arisen out of a contract, express or implied, in favor of some one occupying the relation of creditor, which entitles the latter to receive a sum of money, which obligation, by any possibility, might or ought to be enforced against another. State v. Hawes, 14 N. E. 87, 88, 112 Ind. 323.

A debt is a sum of money due by contract, and it most frequently is due by certain and express agreement, which also fixes the sum independent of any extrinsic circumstances. But it is not essential that the contract should be expressed, or that it should fix the precise amount of the sum to be paid. United States v. Colt (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 581, 582.

"Debts," as used in Act 1851, § 1, providing that debts due to nonresidents are subject to taxation in the same manner and to the same extent as personal estate of residents, is to be understood in its usual legal sense, and means nothing more nor less than sums of money due from inhabitants to the nonresidents mentioned by certain and express agreements or judicial sentence. People v. Halsey (N. Y.) 36 How. Prac. 487, 504.

"Debts," as used in Comp. St. c. 16, § 136, providing that every corporation shall publish the amount of its existing debts, and, if it fail to do so, all the stockholders shall be jointly and severally liable for all the debts of the corporation then existing, means only those obligations arising on express and implied contracts growing out of the dealings between the corporation and other corporations or individuals, where the financial conditions of such corporation were or might be the foundation of credit. Howell v. Roberts, 45 N. W. 923, 924, 29 Neb. 483 (citing Doolittle v. Marsh, 9 N. W. 54, 11 Neb. 243).

Act Cong. Feb. 25, 1862, provided that United States notes issued thereunder should be legal tender in payment of all debts. Held, that by the word "debts" was meant such obligations for the payment of money as are founded on contract. Perry v. Washburn, 20 Cal. 318, 350.

"Debt," as used in a constitutional provision that no person shall be imprisoned for debt in any action founded on contract, means debt in the popular sense of a demand founded on contract, express or implied, and comprises all actions ex contractu. Perry v. Orr, 35 N. J. Law (6 Vroom) 295, 298.

"Debt," as the term is used in Const. art. 1, par. 17, declaring that no person shall be imprisoned for debt in any action or on any judgment founded on contract, unless in case of fraud, etc., means contract debt, and does not include a case where a man promised to marry a woman, and thereafter seduced her by influence of such promise, and then sought to avoid the performance by attempting to run away with intent to abandon her, and refusing to marry her, since his original promise under such circumstances was a fraud, for which he might legally be imprisoned and held to bail in a subsequent action for the injury so done. Perry v. Orr, 35 N. J. Law (6 Vroom) 295.

"Debt," as used in Bill of Rights, Const. § 16, providing that no person shall be imprisoned for debt, except in cases of fraud, means only a liability arising on contract. There are many forms of liabilities that do not constitute a debt, in the technical and legal sense of that term. In re Wheeler, 8 Pac. 276, 277, 34 Kan. 90.

"Debts," as used in 1 Rev. St. (2d Ed.) p. 800, § 19, providing that, if any controversy shall arise between trustees and any other person in settlement of any demands against a debtor or of debts due to his estate, the same may be referred to three indifferent persons by the mutual agreement of the parties, should be construed in its ordinary and legal acceptance, importing a sum of money arising on a contract, express or implied, and would not include a right or title to stock in an incorporated company. In re Denny (N. Y.) 2 Hill, 220, 222.

"Debt" does not mean damages, and an action to recover damages is not an action to recover debt. Millington v. Texas & P. Ry. Co. (Tex.) 2 Willson, Civ. Cas. Ct. App. § 171.

A claim for damages is not a debt. Clark v. Nevada Land & Mining Co., 6 Nev. 203, 208.

A debt embraces a sum of money arising upon a contract, express or implied, and not a mere claim for damages. Thus, where, pending an action for libel, defendant therein died intestate, the claim of the plaintiff, even if meritorious, was not such a debt against the estate of the decedent as would prevent his widow, as sole heir at law, from taking possession of his estate without administration. McElhaney v. Crawford, 22 S. E. 895, 96 Ga. 174.

Partnership debt.

A discharge of an insolvent debtor from all debts founded on any contract made by him included debts due from the firm of which he had been a member. Such debts were, strictly speaking, his debts. He was liable in solido for them, and his individual property, after paying his separate debts, was applicable in insolvency to their payment. Lothrop v. Tilden, 62 Mass. (8 Cush.) 375, 376.

Penalties.

Under Code 1871, § 1302, giving to justices of the peace jurisdiction of suits for the recovery of debts, damages, or personal property, it is held that the term "debt" means anything for which one is liable or bound to another, or which may be exacted of one, and it embraces penalties recoverable in a civil action. Western Union Tel. Co. v. Sullivan, 12 South. 460, 70 Miss. 447.

A penalty in a bastardy proceeding is not a debt, within the constitutional prohibition against imprisonment for debt. State v. Brewer, 16 S. E. 1001, 1003, 38 S. C. 263, 19 L. R. A. 362, 37 Am. St. Rep. 752.

Principal.

Principal, whether due or to become due in the future, is a part of the debt of a municipality, within the provisions of the Constitution limiting such debt. Epping v. City of Columbus, 43 S. E. 803, 808, 117 Ga. 263.

As provable debt.

"Debt," as used in Bankr. Act 1800, § 42, directing that where it shall appear to the commissioners that there hath been mutual credit given by the bankrupt and any other person, or mutual debts between them at any time before such person became bankrupt, the assignee or assignees of the debt shall state the account, and one debt may be set off against the other, "is fairly to be construed to mean any debt for which the act provides. A debt which may be proved before the commissioners, and to the owner of which a dividend must be paid, is a debt in the sense of the term as used in this section." Oxley v. Tucker (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 931.

18 Stat. 180, § 12, providing that any person owing debts as aforesaid, who shall do so and so, shall be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy, does not mean "that the debts shall be of a provable character, or shall be at some time provable, but that they shall be debts provable at the time the petition is filed, and made provable at that time by the statute." In re Morse (U. S.) 17 Fed. Cas. 846, 848.

"Debt," as used in the bankruptcy act, shall include any debt, demand, or claim provable in bankruptcy. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3419.

Recognizance.

A recognizance given by accused in a criminal cause is simply a means of compelling the attendance of the party accused of crime to answer the complaint and abide the order of the court thereon. The liability of the defendant under the recognizance is not a debt in such a sense that he may be allowed to set off against that liability a debt owing to him from the town to which the recognizance was given. Town of Wallingford v. Hall, 45 Conn. 350, 353.

Rent.

Rent due a receiver and unpaid constitutes a debt, within Const. art. 1, § 15, prohibiting imprisonment for debt. Knutte v. Superior Court of City and County of San Francisco, 66 Pac. 875, 134 Cal. 660.

Salary of public officer.

The legal acceptance of debt is said by Blackstone to be a sum of money due by certain and express agreement. The liability of a city for the salary of a public officer fixed by law is not a debt or right arising out of a contract, express or implied, and therefore not subject to garnishment. Troy Laundry & Machinery Co. v. City of Denver, 53 Pac. 256, 257, 11 Colo. App. 368.

The constitutional provision that, on the passage in either house of the Legislature of any law which imposes or creates a debt or charge, the question shall be taken by yeas and nays, etc., refers to the contracting of a public debt for extraordinary expenditures, and has no reference to the salary of public officers. McDonald v. State, 50 N. W. 185, 186, 80 Wis. 407.

Securities distinguished.

There is a difference between the debt itself and the securities for it. The debt is one, but there may be a number of securities of different kinds—personal, real, pledge, mortgage, etc. A note given is only evidence of a debt, and one of the means of collecting; and, if there is a mortgage, that is only another security for the same debt. Ballou v. Young, 42 S. C. 170, 177, 20 S. E. 84, 86.

Sum ordered paid over by court.

The word "debt" is a technical term, and, when construed according to its strict and literal meaning, there is a very close question whether imprisonment, as a means of compelling the party over whom the court has jurisdiction to surrender the possession of money which he has no legal right to keep, is imprisonment for debt within the meaning of the constitutional provision. Ripon Knitting Works v. Schreiber (U. S.) 101 Fed. 810, 816.

A "debt," as the word is used in the statute prohibiting imprisonment for debt recoverable in a civil action, does not include an amount of money due from executors, which they have been ordered to pay over to distributees by the order of distribution. Ex parte Smith, 53 Cal. 204, 207.

An order of the probate court, made upon an executor to pay certain allowances out of the assets of the estate to the widow of the deceased for the support of herself and minor children pending the settlement of the estate, creates no debt against the executor. Leach v. Peabody, 2 Atl. 737, 746. 58 Vt. 485.

Surplus of savings bank.

When the surplus of a savings bank, under a charter and the laws of the state where it exists, belongs to its depositors, and, though it is not payable at the same time with their deposits and may be retained for a time to meet contingencies, depositors or their representatives are ultimately entitled to the pecuniary benefit of it, such surplus is a debt due the depositors, so as not to be subject to taxation under Laws 1857, c. 456. People v. Barker, 47 N. E. 1103, 1104, 154 N. Y. 122.

Tax.

The term "debt" in its ordinary sense does not include a tax. Loeber v. Leininger, 51 N. E. 703, 705, 175 Ill. 484; Jack v. Wiennett, 3 N. E. 445, 446, 115 Ill. 105, 56 Am. Rep. 129; Dunlap v. Gallatin County, 15 Ill. (5 Peck) 7, 9; Iowa Land Co. v. Douglass County, 67 N. W. 52, 56, 8 S. D. 491; Hanson County v. Gray, 80 N. W. 175, 12 S. D. 124, 76 Am. St. Rep. 591; Danforth v. McCook County, 76 N. W. 940, 941, 11 S. D. 258, 47 Am. St. Rep. 808; State v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 23 S. E. 677, 41 W. Va. 81; Gallup v. Schmidt, 56 N. E. 443, 449, 154 Ind. 196; Morris v. Lalaurie, 1 South. 659, 663, 39 La. Ann. 47; City of Shreveport v. Gregg, 28 La. Ann. 836, 837; Atlantic County Chosen Freeholders v. Inhabitants of Weymouth Tp., 54 Atl. 458, 68 N. J. Law, 652; City of Camden v. Allen, 26 N. J. Law (2 Dutch.) 398, 399; Peirce v. City of Boston, 44 Mass. (3 Metc.) 520, 521; State v. O'Neill, 25 Atl. 273, 55 N. J. Law (26

Vroom) 58; City of Hannibal v. Bowman, 71 S. W. 1122, 1123, 98 Mo. App. 103 (citing City of Carondelet v. Picot, 38 Mo. 125); State v. Snyder, 41 S. W. 216, 217, 139 Mo. 549; Richards v. Clay County Com'rs, 58 N. W. 594, 595, 40 Neb. 45, 42 Am. St. Rep. 650; Reynolds v. Fisher, 61 N. W. 695, 699, 43 Neb. 172; State v. Yellow Jacket Silver Min. Co., 14 Nev. 220, 250; Shaw v. Peckett, 26 Vt. 482; Meriwether v. Garrett, 102 U. S. 472, 513, 26 L. Ed. 197; Emsheimer v. City of New Orleans (U. S.) 116 Fed. 893, 895; In re Duryee (U. Rep. 432; City Council of Charleston v. Ashley Phosphate Co., 13 S. E. 845, 847, 34 S. C. 541 (citing Cooley, Tax'n, 13); Bonaparte v. State, 63 Md. 465, 470; Hewitt v. Traders' Bank, 51 Pac. 468, 469, 18 Wash. 326; Perry v. Washburn, 20 Cal. 318, 350; Texarkana Water Co. v. State, 35 S. W. 788, 790, 62 Ark. 188; City of Augusta v. North, 57 Me. 392, 393, 2 Am. Rep. 55; Whiteaker v. Haley, 2 Or. 128, 139; United States v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 84 U. S. (17 Wall.) 322, 326, 21 L. Ed. 597.

A tax, in its essential characteristics, is not a debt, nor in the nature of a debt. A tax is an impost levied by authority of government upon its citizens or subjects for the support of the state. It is not founded on contract or agreement. It operates in invitum. Lane County v. Oregon, 74 U. S. (7 Wall.) 71, 80, 19 L. Ed. 101 (citing City of Camden v. Allen, 26 N. J. Law [2 Dutch.] 398).

Taxes are not debts in the ordinary sense of the term, and their collection will in general depend on the remedies given by statute for their enforcement. Where no remedy is specially provided, a remedy by suit may be fairly implied; but where one is given it does not embrace an action at law. A tax cannot in general be recovered in a common-law action as a debt, and where a statute provides a mode for the collection of taxes, such as by distress and sale of the goods of the delinquent taxpayer, and by creating a lien on his real and personal estate without the right of exemption in the collection of the same, the remedy therein described must be strictly pursued, and no action at common law can be maintained. Appeal of Schied, 7 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 282, 284.

"Debt" in an enlarged sense means a duty to pay on any ground, and in this sense includes a tax, though in strict technical language a tax is not a debt. Gilliam Co. v. Wasco Co., 13 Pac. 324, 14 Or. 525.

"Debt," as used in statutes relating to set-off, means a demand for money due founded upon a contract, and does not include a tax, which is an impost levied by authority of government upon the citizens or subjects for the support of the state, and is not founded upon contract or agreement, but operates in invitum. Gatling v. Carteret County Com'rs, 92 N. C. 536, 539, 53 Am. Rep. 432.

"Debts," as used in Georgia laws relating to the settlement of estates by the executors, and declaring priority of the debts to be as follows: Funeral expenses, including the physicians' bills and expenses of last sickness; the necessary expenses of administration, and including a provision for the support of the family; unpaid taxes, or other debts due the state or United States, etc.—includes taxes levied for state purposes, but it does not include taxes levied for county purposes. Hargrove v. Lilly, 69 Ga. 326, 329.

"Debts," as used in Rev. St. § 3466 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2314], providing that, whenever the estate of a deceased person in the hands of his administrator is insufficient to pay all the debts due the deceased, the debts due the United States shall be first satisfied, does not include taxes and funeral charges. United States v. Eggleston (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 979, 981.

Pub. St. c. 106, § 60, providing that the officers of a corporation who knowingly make a false certificate on the condition of the corporation shall be jointly and severally liable for its debts and contracts, should be construed to include debts existing when the certificate was made, as well as future debts, and includes a tax duly assessed against a corporation and presently payable. Felker v. Standard Yarn Co., 19 N. E. 220, 221, 148 Mass. 226.

In the most extensive sense of the term everything is a debt which is an absolute obligation, but in its more limited sense it imports only a particular kind of duty, and in this sense is substantially synonymous with "contract." In this sense it is more generally used in statutes relating to the execution of process, and therefore the several acts of Congress exempting soldiers from arrest for any debt or contract, does not bestow on a soldier an exemption from arrest for payment of taxes. Webster v. Seymour, 8 Vt. 135, 139.

While it has been held in North Carolina that, when a tax is imposed, the taxpayer becomes a debtor, and what he owes is a debt in one sense of the word, as embracing any kind of just demand, yet the right of a sheriff to collect such tax after he has settled for them with the proper authorities is not such debt as is subject to attachment. Davie v. Blackburn, 23 S. E. 321, 322, 117 N. C. 383.

The United States Supreme Court decided in Dollar Sav. Bank v. United States, 86 U. S. (19 Wall.) 227, 22 L. Ed. 80, that an internal revenue tax was a debt, in the sense that it might be collected by an action at law; but in Lane County v. Oregon, 74 U. S. (7 Wall.) 71, 19 L. Ed. 101, it decided that taxes, whether state or national, are not debts, so as to be subject to the legal tender laws then in existence. But in any view of the case the defendant, in an action brought by the United States to enforce the payment of taxes, cannot plead a set-off growing out of independent claims against the United States. United States v. Pacific R. Co. (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 397.

A special tax or assessment is not an ordinary debt arising out of contract, express or implied, though partaking somewhat of the nature of a debt, and is not a debt within the rule that a debt may be assigned. Hinchman v. Morris, 2 S. E. 863, 871, 29 W. Va. 673.

A special tax levied by county commissioners on all the property of the taxing district is not an indebtedness of the township or townships composing such taxing district, but is an indebtedness of the taxpayers secured by lien on their property, and for which sum their property is liable, and is no more to be counted in ascertaining the indebtedness of a township than the individual indebtedness of the inhabitants of the town. Monroe County Com'rs v. Harrell, 46 N. E. 124, 127, 147 Ind. 500.

"Debt or demand," as used in Gen. St. c. 208, § 7, providing that, where "there are mutual debts or demands between the plaintiff and the defendant at the time of the commencement of the plaintiff's action, one debt or demand may be set off against the other," cannot be construed to include taxes assessed by a township, the trustee, in the suit against the principal defendant, so that they may be set off against the sum due from the trustee to the defendant. The words "debt" and "demand" are often used as synonymous. The former is the more specific, and the latter the more general, term. Either would include a claim for money alleged to be due, and either is broad enough to allow a judgment, recovered by the trustee against the principal defendant, to be set off against the sum found due the latter from the former in the process of foreign attachment. Hibbard v. Clark, 56 N. H. 153, 157, 22 Am. Rep. 442.

"Debt," as used in Act Cong. Feb. 25, 1862, authorizing the issue of legal tender treasury notes, and making such notes legal tender in the payment of all debts, public and private, is not used in the sense of meaning merely a sum of money due by express and certain agreement, but in the sense of any claim for money, or that which is due from one person to another, that which one person is bound to pay or perform to another, and hence includes a tax levied by a territorial Legislature. Haas v. Misner, 1 Idaho, 170, 177.

In a contract of dissolution, by which one partner agreed to pay all debts contracted by the firm, the word "debts" includes taxes due by the firm. Young v. Clute, 12 Nev. 81, 37.

A tax levied or authorized by the territorial Legislature of Idaho is a debt within the meaning of the act of Congress authorizing the issue of legal tender treasury notes, and therefore the territorial statute requiring the payment of taxes in gold coin or its equivalent is void, as being in conflict with the act of Congress authorizing the issue of legal tender treasury notes. Haas v. Misner, 1 Idaho, 170.

An act of Congress declaring that treasury notes are payable for all taxes, internal duties, excises, debts, and demands of every kind due to the United States, except for interest on bonds and notes, and shall also be lawful money and a legal tender in the payment of all debts, public and private, is not inconsistent with the statute of the state requiring that taxes be paid in gold and silver. The books define taxes as a contribution levied or imposed by government upon cities or individuals for the service of the state. With us they mean the poll and property assessment of the statute. They do not certainly come within the meaning of public or private debts. They have none of the characteristics of a debt. A debt is something arising from and due upon contract, and before an enforcement of that something due can happen there must come the process of the law and the solemn adjudication of the courts. A tax is a judgment in its inception, fixed without the consent of the taxpayer, perhaps without his knowledge as to assessment, levy, and collection. It needs not the issuance of an execution to enforce it. If not paid in due time penalties follow, and, willing or not, upon default, the delinquent's personal property passes by collector's sale to the purchaser, or he loses the title to his real estate. There is none of the mutuality which enters into a contract, and none of the legal incidents of a debt. Whiteaker v. Hailey, 2 Or. 128, 139.

The claim of the county against an estate for taxes does not stand on the same footing with other indebtedness. It is entitled to priority in payment. A tax is not an ordinary debt. It is levied for support of the government, and takes precedence of all other demands against the owner. It is a charge upon the property, without reference to the matter of ownership. The property itself may be seized and sold, although there may be prior liens or encumbrances upon it. The estate of a deceased person is primarily liable for the taxes that may be due from it. The state is not bound to wait until the estate is administered, and then participate with the creditors in the distribution of the proceeds. It may enforce payment to the exclusion of all other creditors. Dunlap v. Gallatin County, 15 Ill. (5 Peck) 7, 9.

Trust distinguished.

A debt, in the technical sense, is money due or owing on account of a contract, expressed or implied, while a trust, strictly speaking, is an obligation arising out of a confidence reposed in a person to whom the legal title to property is conveyed upon the condition that he will faithfully apply it according to the direction and risks of the vendor. Thornburg v. Buck, 41 N. E. 85, 86, 18 Ind. App. 446.

Unpaid stock subscription.

"Debt," as used in the by-laws of a banking corporation, declaring that the bank reserves a lien upon all stock issued to and held by any stockholder for the security of any debt owing in any form to said bank by such stockholder, whether the same is due or not, is to be construed to include unpaid subscriptions on such stock, though no call has been made for the payment thereof. Kahn v. Bank of St. Joseph, 70 Mo. 262, 272.

Verdict.

Act March 4, 1859, § 61, providing that it shall be lawful for a judge, on the ex parte application of a judgment debtor, to order that all debts owing or accruing, etc., does not include a mere verdict in an action on contract for unliquidated damages, since prior to the final judgment there was no debt owing or accruing. Dresser v. Johns, 6 C. B. (N. S.) 429, 436.

A verdict does not convert a claim for unliquidated damages into a debt. Thayer v. Southwick, 74 Mass. (8 Gray) 229. It does not become a debt, for the purpose of a trustee process, until it passes into judgment. Wilde v. Mahaney, 67 N. E. 337, 339, 183 Mass. 455, 62 L. R. A. 813.

A verdict does not annihilate or extinguish a debt, or change the nature of it, or the rule of law. It only amounts to a conclusive evidence of the debt, so that the creditor has the same right to set it off after the verdict as he had before; and, where the creditor is sued by the debtor after a verdict for the debt has been obtained, the creditor may set up the debt as a set-off, as he could have done had no suit been brought thereon. Bell v. Cowgell (Pa.) 1 Ashm. 7, 9.

Wages.

See "Wages."

Warrant.

The term "debts" includes certificates issued by a city, which state that the city owes the holder a specified sum of money, and containing its promise to or a direction to its treasurer to pay such money at a specified time. Law v. People, 87 Ill. 385, 393.

Warrants drawn upon designated funds in anticipation of uncollected revenue have always been regarded in this state as debts in only a restricted sense (In re State Warrants, 6 S. D. 518, 62 N. W. 101, 55 Am. St. Rep. 852; Western Town Lot Co. v. Lane, 7 S. D. 1, 62 N. W. 982; Shannon v. City of Huron, 9 S. D. 356, 69 N. W. 598; Lawrence County v. Meade County, 10 S. D. 175, 72 N. W. 405), and are not outstanding debts, so as to authorize the creation of sinking fund for their payment. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co. v. Faulk County, 90 N. W. 149, 15 S. D. 501.

DEBT (Action of).

Assumpsit distinguished, see "Assumpsit."

"The action of debt at common law was for the recovery of debt eo nomine and in numero, and is most frequently brought on a deed." State v. Harmon, 15 W. Va. 115, 124.

Debt is a form of action provided at common law as the remedy for the recovery of a sum certain, due to the plaintiff. While we have no specific action for debt as at common law, yet the same general principles are applicable under our system, and, as used in Rev. St. art. 3203, providing for actions for debt, it means suits for the recovery of debts. At common law this action is a remedy upon statutes, first, when an action for debt is given by the statute, and, second, where the statute provides for the payment of a sum of money or gives a penalty or a forfeiture on the doing of a forbidden act. Davidson v. Missouri Pac. Ry. Co. (Tex.) 3 Willson Civ. Cas. Ct. App. § 173.

Act Gen. Assem. 1805, relative to a limitation of actions, and prescribing the time within which all actions of debt shall be brought, means those actions which were commonly brought on simple contracts. Bishop v. Sanford, 15 Ga. 1, 4.

The common-law action of debt lies whenever the demand is for a sum certain, or is capable of being readily reduced to a certainty, and is the appropriate action for the recovery of the statutory penalty, upon the ground of implied promise which the law annexes to its liability. Russell v. Louisville R. Co., 25 S. E. 99, 100, 93 Va. 322.

By the common law an action of debt is a general remedy for the recovery of all sums certain, whether the legal liability arise from contract or be created by statute. United States v. Lyman (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 1024, 1030.

Debt is defined in Bacon's Abridgment to be an action founded on a distress or implied contract, in which the certainty of the sum or duty appears, and "therefore the plaintiff is to recover the sum in numero, and not to be repaid in damages by the jury." The three distinguishing points in the action of debt are that the contract must be, first, one for money; second, for a sum certain; and, third, specifically recoverable. Such an action will not lie on a writing obligatory for $200 to be paid in lumber. Cassady v. Laughlin (Ind.) 3 Blackf. 134, 135. And see Watson v. McNairy, 4 Ky. (1 Bibb) 356, 357.

"An action of debt will not lie to charge a person, where a particular mode of payment is agreed on, unless there has been a failure on the part of the defendant." Harris v. Baker (Conn.) 1 Root, 220.

Debt lies whenever a sum certain is due, without regard to the way in which the obligation was incurred, or by what it is evidenced. Omaha Nat. Bank v. Mutual Ben. Life Ins. Co. (U. S.) 81 Fed. 935, 939.

Debt lies when one is entitled to receive a certain unliquidated sum of money, or in case of a bond for the payment of money or the performance of some act under a penalty, or for goods sold and delivered, etc. Mitchell v. McNabb, 58 Me. 506, 507.

An action of debt does not lie on a collateral or conditional undertaking. Reid v. Blaney, 2 Me. (2 Greenl.) 128, 129.

An action of debt will not lie on a writing to pay "a horse at the value of £30," since it is one of the essentials of an action for debt that the contract be for money and specifically recoverable. Watson v. McNairy, 4 Ky. (1 Bibb) 356, 357.

An action of debt will not lie upon a sealed instrument wherein is contained no promise to pay any sum of money under any terms or conditions, but a bill of sale of certain tools used in and about boot and shoe business, together with the debtor's good will, and an agreement not to carry on such business in the city for a certain time. Mitchell v. McNabb, 58 Me. 506, 507.

By "action of debt," as used in Rev. St. §§ 3104, 3106, providing for the recovery of usurious interest in an action of debt, the Legislature did not, we think, mean to require that the action be technically that action known as such at the common law, for the reason that we have no forms of action. Still it is true that the provision gives only the right to recover the penalty by some action for it, as for a debt, so that the debtor cannot do so by a purely defensive pleading when sued for the debt. Rosetti v. Lomano, 70 S. W. 204, 205, 96 Tex. 57.

An action of debt is the proper remedy for duties against the owner or importer under the rules of the common law. United States v. Lyman (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 1024, 1028.

DEBT ACTUALLY DUE.

Where a bank charter provided that all debts actually due and payable to the corporation by a stockholder requesting a transfer must be satisfied before such transfer should be made, the words "debts actually due and payable to the corporation" implied more than mere indebtedness, but did not include paper not due at the time the transfer was demanded. Reese v. Bank of Commerce, 14 Md. 271, 283, 74 Am. Dec. 536.

DEBT AND COSTS PAID.

An entry by plaintiff on the docket, after suit brought, "Debt and costs paid," is equivalent to "satisfaction." Phillips v. Israel (Pa.) 10 Serg. & R. 391, 392.

DEBT BY SPECIALTY.

Debts by specialty are such whereby a sum of money becomes or is acknowledged to be due by debt or instrument under seal. Tyler's Ex'rs v. Winslow, 15 Ohio St. 364, 366; Probate Court for Orleans Dist. v. Child, 51 Vt. 82, 86; Kimball v. Whitney, 15 Ind. 280, 282. In the case of Stockwell v. Coleman, 10 Ohio St. 40, the court say that the term "specialty," in the strict and early use of the word, was regarded as applicable only to bonds, deeds, or other instruments under seal. In Marriott v. Thompson, Willes, 189, the court say: "Whenever a man by deed obliges himself to pay money to another, it is a debt by specialty." A mortgage is an instrument whereby a debt or duty is acknowledged to be due or owing to another, and very often an agreement or promise in writing is contained therein; and a mortgage sealed and delivered is a "specialty," within the definition of the term. Kerr v. Lydecker, 51 Ohio St. 240, 252, 37 N. E. 267, 23 L. R. A. 842.

DEBT CONTRACTED.

The term "debts contracted," as used in a statute providing that an exemption shall be valid against debts created both before and after the passage of the law, must "ex vi termini" mean all debts, and not some particular debt, to the exclusion of others." Darling v. Berry (U. S.) 13 Fed. 659, 664.

The term "debts contracted," as used in Gen. St. Mass. 1821, c. 28, providing that every person, who shall become a member of any manufacturing corporation which may be hereafter established in this commonwealth, shall be liable in his individual capacity for all debts contracted during the time of his continuing a member of such corporation, means not only debts in the strict sense of the term, but includes any liabilities incurred by the corporation. Carver v. Braintree Mfg. Co. (U. S.) 5 Fed. Cas. 235, 241.

A debt was clearly contracted in the erection of a building, within the purview of the acts regarding mechanics' liens, although the parties might not have struck a balance of the amount due resulting from their mutual dealings. A debt may be contracted, though it may be the subject of set-off founded on a quantum meruit, in which case the amount due is liquidated. McCall v. Eastwick (Pa.) 2 Miles, 45, 47.

Costs.

"Debts contracted," as used in Rev. St. U. S. § 2296 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1398], providing that lands acquired under the homestead act shall not in any event become liable to the satisfaction of any debts contracted prior to the issue of the patent therefor, does not necessarily mean debts or obligations incurred by an agreement of parties. The word "contract" has a more extensive signification than to make an agreement. "Debts contracted," in the ordinary acceptance of the term, will include liabilities incurred. Costs in the proceedings for bigamy, which are taxed against a homesteader prior to the issue of his patents, are debts contracted, within the meaning of the statute. State v. O'Neill, 7 Or. 141, 143.

Delivery necessary.

As used in 2 Rev. St. p. 493, entitled "An act in relation to demands against ships and vessels," and providing that, whenever a debt amounting to $50 or upwards shall be contracted in the manner specified in the act, such debt shall be a lien, means not only the agreement to furnish goods to a vessel, but the actual delivery thereof; and there is no debt contracted until the goods are delivered. Veltman v. Thompson, 3 N. Y. (3 Comst.) 438, 440.

Fine.

Under a provision of the Constitution exempting a homestead from sale under execution or other process issued on any demand for any "debt contracted," a fine imposed by statute for the violation of the law cannot in any just sense be designated as a debt contracted. The ordinary meaning of the word "debt" is a sum of money due to another by contract, and a "debt contracted" necessarily means that the debtor has come under a voluntary obligation to pay it. The relation of debtor and creditor implies that the one has given credit to the other in contract. It would be a solecism to observe and say that the fine imposed as a punishment for a penal offense was a debt contracted. Contracted how? Contracted with whom? A debt contracted implies the voluntary action of debtor and creditor founded on a valuable consideration. This cannot be predicated upon a fine imposed by mere punishment. The very essence of a contract is taken away when the amount is assessed as a penalty for violating law claimed as a punishment for crime. Whiteacre v. Rector (Va.) 29 Grat. 714-716, 28 Am. Rep. 420.

Judgment in scire facias.

The term "debt contracted," as used in Gen. St. 1868, p. 174, tit. 7, § 416, making the president, directors, or secretary of any corporation who shall intentionally neglect or refuse to comply with the provisions of the act liable for all debts of such corporation during the period of such neglect or refusal, does not include a judgment in scire facias. "There cannot be a debt contracted without two or more contracting parties, one of whom in this case must be the corporation. The phrase, therefore, necessarily implies some act on the part of the corporation with some party dealing with it whereby an obligation is incurred; the company receiving, and the other party giving, credit on the faith of their solvency and proper organization as a corporation." Armstrong v. Cowles, 44 Conn. 44, 48.

Judgment for tort.

The term "debts contracted," as used in a statute which provided that the stockholders of every company incorporated under the act should be jointly and severally liable for the debts of the company for an amount equal to the amount of any unpaid stock in the company held by them at the time any debt was contracted, meant claims against the company arising from contract, and did not embrace a judgment for tort. Bohn v. Brown, 33 Mich. 257, 263; Leighton v. Campbell, 20 Atl. 14, 15, 17 R. I. 51, 9 L. R. A. 187.

There is no language to be found in the act relating to exemptions indicating an intention to exempt from sale any property on judgments, except for debts contracted. If the intention had been to extend the exemption to sales under all judgments recovered, it would have been quite easy to have so expressed it, and it is most likely, if that had been the intention, that it would have been so expressed in the act. The omission to do so, and the limitation in words to debts contracted, afford pregnant evidence that the Legislature did not intend to extend its operation beyond the cases expressed. Therefore a homestead is not exempt from sale on execution issued upon a judgment for a cause of action sounding in tort, nor on an execution issued in such action on a judgment for the defendant for costs. Lathrop v. Singer (N. Y.) 39 Barb. 396, 398, 399.

Const. 1862, art. 14, § 2, exempting homestead from liability for any debt contracted after the adoption of the Constitution, has no application to judgments for torts or liabilities in the nature of torts. Schuessler v. Dudley, 2 South. 526, 527, 80 Ala. 547, 60 Am. Rep. 124.

The phrase "debts contracted," as used in the homestead act of 1851, that exempted the homestead from forced sale under any process or order from any court of law or equity for debts contracted after the 4th of July, 1851, embraces a judgment for slander. Conroy v. Sullivan, 44 Ill. 451, 452.

Const. art. 16, § 2, provides that every homestead shall be exempt from forced sale on execution or any other final process from a court for any debts contracted after the adoption of the Constitution. Held, that the word "contracted" was often used in a broader sense than as meaning a debt arising out of a contract. Thus a disease may be contracted, while not contracted for. The words "liability contracted," etc., have been held to have a broader signification than the words "debt contracted"; but a contract liability is as much a liability growing out of a contract as is a contract debt a debt founded on contract. Therefore the word "contract," as used in the statute, did not limit the word "debt" to debts founded purely on contract, but included all debts which had become ripened into contract liabilities, thus including debts founded on torts which had been reduced to judgment. Mertz v. Berry, 59 N. W. 445, 446, 101 Mich. 32, 24 L. R. A. 789, 45 Am. St. Rep. 379.

Obligation ex delicto.

A statute allowing the head of a family to hold, exempt from levy on any "debt contracted," property not to exceed a certain value, should be construed to include every judgment, whatever may have been the nature of the action in which it was obtained, whether arising ex contractu or ex delicto. Bouvier says: "Debt is a sum of money due by certain and express agreement." In a less technical sense it means any claim for money. In a still more enlarged sense, it denotes any kind of a just demand, as the debts of a bankrupt. One of the meanings given in our dictionaries of the word "contract," as a verb, is, "to incur"; so that a "debt contracted" in an enlarged or literal sense means any kind of just demand incurred. The words "debt contracted" are not to be taken in their narrowest meaning, as describing only debts which are expressly agreed to be paid by the debtor. In re Radway (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 154, 162.

Within the provision that no homestead on public lands shall become liable for the satisfaction of any debt or debts contracted prior to the issue of a patent therefor, the word "contract" has a more extensive signification than to make an agreement. The words "debts contracted" do not necessarily mean debts or obligations incurred by the agreement of the parties. "Debts contracted," in the ordinary acceptance of the term, will include liability incurred. State v. O'Neill, 7 Or. 141. And the liability for a tort growing out of the breach of a contract warranting the title of certain personal property is included. Flanagan v. Forsythe, 50 Pac. 152, 153, 6 Okl. 225.

Under a statute allowing a homestead exemption as against "debts contracted," it is held that a demand for damages for breach of promise to marry is not a debt contracted, within the meaning of the statute. Burton v. Mill, 78 Va. 468, 481.

A statute providing that no property shall be exempt from sale for nonpayment of taxes or assessments, or for a debt contracted for the purchase thereof, would not include a claim by reason of a good cause of action for a breach of promise of marriage: for, though the action is founded on a promise, so far as form is concerned, it is substantially an action of tort. Cook v. Newman (N. Y.) 8 How. Prac. 523, 524; Newman v. Cook, 11 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 62.

DEBT CREATED BY FRAUD.

See, also, "Fraud."

The bankruptcy act, providing that no debt created by fraud shall be discharged by proceedings in bankruptcy, should be construed to include the liability of one with whom money had been left to keep until called for, and which he had used in his own business. Hammond v. Noble, 57 Vt. 193, 199.

A debt created by fraud is a debt created by positive fraud, involving moral turpitude or intentional wrong, as distinguished from implied fraud or fraud in law, which may exist without the imputation of bad faith or dishonesty. Gibson v. Gorman, 44 N. J. Law (15 Vroom) 325, 327.

DEBT CREATED IN A FIDUCIARY CHARACTER.

See "Fiduciary Capacity or Character."

DEBT, DEFAULT, OR MISCARRIAGE OF ANOTHER.

The term "debt, default, or miscarriage of another," as used in the statute of frauds, requiring such promises to be in writing, means only promises made to the person to whom another is answerable. Pratt v. Humphrey, 22 Conn. 317, 325.

The requirement of the statute of frauds that a promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another must be in writing means a promise to the creditor of the third person, and does not include a promise to the debtor himself. The theory of the statute of frauds is that, when a third party promises the creditor to pay him a debt due to him from a person named, the effect of such a promise is to become a surety or guarantor only, and shall be manifested by written evidence. The promise in such a case is to the creditor, not to the debtor. Aldrich v. Ames, 75 Mass. (9 Gray) 76, 77; Mersereau v. Lewis (N. Y.) 25 Wend. 243, 247.

A promise to a debtor, or to one who may on a certain contingency become a debtor, made on a valuable consideration moving from the debtor, to pay the debt and save the debtor harmless, is not a promise to pay the debt of another, within the meaning of the statute of frauds. Neither does the promise to pay the debt of another come within the statute when the party promising has for his object a benefit which he did not before enjoy, accruing immediately to himself. And so, where by a verbal contract A. agreed to transfer to S. his stock, it being the greater part of all the stock in a certain corporation, and S. agreed to convey to A. certain property and to take A.'s interest in the corporation and to indemnify A. against his indorsements on the outstanding notes of the corporation, and the trade was made, the promise in relation to indemnification against the indorsements was not a promise to answer the debt, default, or miscarriage of another, within the meaning of the statute. Alger v. Scoville, 67 Mass. (1 Gray) 391, 394.

Rev. St. p. 264, providing that no one shall be liable for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another, unless they have so agreed in writing, means undertakings made to the person to whom another is bound, and has no application to a case where one promises a subscriber to stock in a corporation to be answerable to the corporation for all liability on the subscription. North v. Robinson, 62 Ky. (1 Duv.) 71, 73.

The term "debt of another," within the meaning of the statute of frauds, requiring a promise to pay the debt of another to be in writing, does not characterize the obligation of the purchaser of land arising from agreement by him, with a debtor of the grantor, whose debt was a lien on the land.

to pay such debt. Taylor v. Preston, 79 Pa. (29 P. F. Smith) 436, 441.

C., who was a large stockholder of a corporation, verbally promised M. that, if he would subscribe and pay $500 to the capital stock of the company, he should within one year receive 15 per cent. on what he invested. M., in consideration of this promise, subscribed and paid for the stock. No dividends were made or earned within the year. Held, that the contract was not one to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another, as used in the statute of frauds, inasmuch as there was no debt or legal duty owing by the corporation to plaintiff for which C. undertook to answer on defendant's default, but the contract being entirely distinct and independent of any obligation of the corporation. Moorehouse v. Cranleigh, 36 Ohio St. 130, 132, 38 Am. Rep. 564.

DEBT DUE.

See "Debt Actually Due"; "Due."

DEBT DUE TO THE PUBLIC.

The phrase "debts due to the public" as used in the act of 1789 (Gen. St. 1872, p. 457), relating to priority of payment out of assets, includes a debt due by a surety on the county treasurer's bond, at the time of his death, for the default of his principal. Baxter v. Baxter, 23 S. C. 114, 116.

DEBT FOR PENALTIES.

A debt for penalties is distinguished from other debts, in that it is in its nature ex delicto, while all other debts are ex contractu. Corry v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 45 Atl. 341, 342, 194 Pa. 516; Osborn v. First Nat. Bank, 26 Atl. 289, 290, 154 Pa. 134, 137.

DEBT FOUNDED ON CONTRACT.

As used in Const. art. 1, § 16, providing that no person shall be imprisoned for debt arising out of or founded on a contract, express or implied, is to be "taken in its broad and popular sense, as indicating a right accrued, a sum of money or other thing due or delivered by virtue of a contract expressed between the parties or implied from their acts and circumstances, or on account of a breach of it in respect to some matter provided for or contemplated by them when it was made, something springing out of contract and for the enforcement of which resort must be had to it, and seems not to include damages for those wrongful acts which either party may possibly do, and which, when done, are remotely connected with it, but were not anticipated by them at the time of making of it." In re Mowry, 12 Wis. 52, 57.

Laws 1831 provide that, in order to authorize the issuance of a verdict, it must appear by the affidavit presented that the judgment is founded on contract, or that the cause of action is to recover damages for nonperformance of a contract, express or implied. Held, that a contract within the statute must be one resulting from the voluntary arrangement of the parties, and not one implied in law for the purpose of giving a remedy for a wrong. People v. Speir, 77 N. Y. 144, 151.

A judgment recovered by a woman for breach of marriage contract is founded on contract, and is provable against his estate in bankruptcy. In re McCauley (U. S.) 101 Fed. 223, 224.

A judgment obtained on breach of marriage promise is a "debt founded on contract," and barred by discharge in bankruptcy. In re Sidle (U. S.) 22 Fed. Cas. 102.

Where, in an action for breach of promise of marriage, a verdict was recovered before defendant filed his petition in bankruptcy, on which judgment was entered before he applied for discharge, such claim was provable under section 63 of the bankruptcy law, since it was founded on a contract and reduced to judgment after the filing of the petition and before the consideration of his application for discharge. In re Fife (U. S.) 109 Fed. 880, 881.

The liability of stockholders of a corporation for the debts of the corporation under the statutes of Ohio is not only a liability created by statute, but is also founded on an implied contract, as that expression is used in Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 63a, 30 Stat. 562 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3447], and is provable in bankruptcy, if the circumstances are such that the claimant could have maintained a suit to enforce the stockholder's liability. In re Rouse (U. S.) 1 Am. Bankr. Rep. 393, 397.

Alimony.

A decree of alimony to be performed by the payment of money is not evidence of a "debt founded on contract," express or implied, so as to be discharged by a discharge in insolvency. Noyes v. Hubbard, 23 Atl. 727, 64 Vt. 302, 15 L. R. A. 394, 33 Am. St. Rep. 928.

The term "debt founded on contract," as used in Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 63, 30 Stat. 562 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3447], does not include a decree granting alimony, and therefore it is not affected by the discharge of the husband in bankruptcy. People v. Grell, 65 N. Y. Supp. 522.

Costs.

Statutes, exempting certain property from execution sale under a judgment for a "debt growing out of or founded on a contract, express or implied," cannot be construed to include a debt arising out of a judgment for costs on the reversal of another judgment. Ross v. Banta, 34 N. E. 865, 871, 140 Ind. 120; In re Owens (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 925.

Penalty.

A statute exempting certain property from execution for debts growing out of or founded upon a contract does not include a statutory liability or penalty for using a toll road without paying toll therefor, as prohibited by statute, as such liability is not a debt, but merely a statutory liability for the violation of law. Keller v. McMahan, 77 Ind. 62, 64.

Tax.

As used in Code Civ. Proc. § 2223, defining the jurisdiction of the city court of Albany, and declaring that it shall have jurisdiction of all actions for debt on implied contracts, includes an action to recover a tax assessed on personalty. Bowe v. Jenkins, 23 N. Y. Supp. 548, 549, 69 Hun, 458.

DEBT OF ESTATE.

The words "debts of the estate" naturally import debts owed by the decedent's estate. Cotton v. Holloway, 12 South. 172, 176, 96 Ala. 544.

DEBT OF RECORD.

Blackstone says a debt of record is a contract of the highest nature, "being established by the sentence of a court of judicature." * * * It includes a judgment." Burnes v. Simpson, 9 Kan. 658, 664.

A debt of record is a sum of money which appears to be due by the evidence of a court of record. Kimball v. Whitney, 15 Ind. 280, 282; Tyler's Ex'rs v. Winslow, 15 Ohio St. 364, 368.

In the classification of legal subjects, a judgment is called a "debt of record," because of the obligation to pay it which is imposed on the party against whom it is rendered; but the nature of the transaction is not changed by the reduction of it to a judgment. Atrill v. Huntington, 16 Atl. 651, 654, 70 Md. 191, 2 L. R. A. 779, 14 Am. St. Rep. 344. See, also, Bennett v. Bennett, 49 Atl. 501, 502, 63 N. J. Eq. 306; Provident Sav. Life Assur. Soc. v. Ford, 5 Sup. Ct. 1104, 1107, 114 U. S. 635, 29 L. Ed. 261; Davidson v. Smith (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 38.

DEBT OR DAMAGES DEMANDED.

The words "debt or damages demanded," as used in the various statutes defining the jurisdiction of the courts, have repeatedly been held to refer to the ad damnum of the right, and not to the amount claimed in the declaration or proved at the trial. Wright v. Potomska Mills Corp., 138 Mass. 328, 329 (citing Clay v. Barlow, 123 Mass. 378); Clay v. Barlow, 123 Mass. 378, 379.

DEBT OR DEMAND.

A debt or demand means "any debt or demand," and is of universal application. Van Ingen v. Parmenter, 44 N. E. 121, 166 Mass. 128.

DEBT PAYABLE IN THE FUTURE.

A "debt payable in the future" is one which neither the debtor has a right to pay nor the creditor a right to demand instantly. Seymour v. Dunham (N. Y.) 24 Hun, 93, 94.

DEBT RECOVERED.

Where a judgment in an action against a married woman recites that the principal sum mentioned in the note sued on "is due" the plaintiff, and it is "ordered, adjudged, and decreed that" such sum "be paid to the plaintiff," etc., nothing is wanting to the identification of such sum as the debt which has been recovered, within the meaning of the statute providing that an appeal bond, to operate as a stay of execution, must be in double the amount of "whatever debts have been recovered" by the judgment. Gawtry v. Adams, 10 Mo. App. 29, 32, 34.

DEBT SECURED.

Mortgage distinguished, see "Mortgage."

DEBTOR.

See "Delinquent Debtor"; "Joint Debtor"; "Judgment Debtor"; "Primary Debtor"; "Principal Debtor."
Any debtor, see "Any."

A debtor is one who owes a debt. Jaqua v. Shewalter, 37 N. E. 1072, 1073, 10 Ind. App. 234; In re Nicollin, 56 N. W. 587, 588, 55 Minn. 130; Scott v. City of Davenport, 34 Iowa, 208, 213 (citing Bouv. Law Dict. 380).

A debtor is one who, by reason of an existing obligation, is or may become liable to pay money to another, whether such liability is certain or contingent. Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 4480; Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 3429; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 5047; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 2363; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 2769.

Every one who owes to another the performance of an obligation is called a "debtor," and one to whom he owes it is called a "creditor." Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 2786; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 5113; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 2447.

An obligor or debtor is the person who has engaged to perform some obligation. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 3556, subd. 21.

A debtor is one who owes another anything, or is under obligation, arising from express agreement, implication of law, or the principles of natural justice, to render and pay a sum of money to another. Stanly v. Ogden (Conn.) 2 Root, 259, 262; Keith v. Hiner, 38 S. W. 13, 14, 63 Ark. 244.

"Debtor," as used in a statute in relation to fraudulent conveyances by debtors, includes any one liable upon a contract, express or implied, though only contingently. Schmidt v. Opie, 33 N. J. Eq. (6 Stew.) 138, 139.

A debtor is one who owes anything, or who is under obligation, arising from express agreement, implication of law, or the principles of natural justice, to render and pay a sum of money to another. Melvin v. State, 53 Pac. 416, 419, 121 Cal. 16.

The word "debtor," in its broad sense, implies liability. Rudd v. Ford, 15 S. W. 179, 91 Ky. 183.

St. 1838, c. 163, § 3, declares that, when any creditor shall have any mortgage or pledge of any real or personal estate of the debtor for securing the payment of any debt claimed by him, the property so held as security shall, if he require it, be sold, and the proceeds applied to the payment of his debt, and he shall be admitted as a creditor in insolvency proceedings for the residue thereof. Held, that the term "debtor," in such section, was not necessarily limited to an insolvent debtor whose estate is in progress of settlement, but it was equally consistent with the manifest equity and policy of the statute to construe it to mean any person liable for the debt. Lanckton v. Wolcott, 47 Mass. (6 Metc.) 305, 307.

As used in Bankrupt Act U. S. § 56, providing that, "In all cases where the assignees shall prosecute any debtor of the bankrupt for any debt, duty, or demand, the commission, or a certified copy thereof, the assignment of the commissioners of the bankrupt's estate shall be conclusive evidence of the issuing of the commission," by "debtor" is to be understood any person against whom a judgment exists in favor of the assignees of the bankrupt, and not merely a person who owes a debt or duty. Barstow v. Adams (Conn.) 2 Day, 70, 98. The word "debtor" as so used seems to have been intended as a correlative to the words "debt, duty or demand"; and hence, if the defendants had fraudulently possessed themselves of the property of the bankrupt, they ought to be held debtors. Sands v. Codwise (N. Y.) 4 Johns. 536, 558.

Where an affidavit in poor debtor proceedings alleges that the debtors have property which they do not intend to apply in payment of the judgment, the allegation is to be construed as used in a distributive sense, and as meaning that the debtors each have property. Stearns v. Hemenway, 37 N. E. 766, 162 Mass. 17.

By the term "debtors to the bank," as used in discussing the rules of equity which should control the settlement of its affairs, is meant all those who at the appointment of the receiver were liable to the bank for the payment of money, whether their liability had matured or not, and without any regard to the exact nature of the liability, whether as principal or surety. It does not include those who become indebted to the receiver, for the same reason that a person who has become a debtor to the administrator of an insolvent estate is not considered a debtor to the intestate; nor is it intended to include stockholders or officers of the corporation, against whom the receiver may be directed to bring action to recover sums due for subscription for stock or other like claims. In all matters pertaining to set-offs, such indebtedness or liability as that last named is considered as due strictly to the receiver, and not to the corporation. Davis v. Industrial Mfg. Co., 19 S. E. 371, 372, 114 N. C. 321, 23 L. R. A. 322.

Rev. St. c. 35, § 4, providing that it shall be lawful for the debtor (the creditor being living) to become a witness, and that he shall be admitted as such in the trial of any action wherein the fact of unlawful interest having been reserved or taken is to be in issue, etc., does not mean only debtors and creditors, between whom the relation of debtor and creditor actually subsists at the time of the trial, but is meant to signify the parties to the original contract alleged to be usurious, or, in other words, the original debtor and creditor. Gifford v. Whitcomb, 63 Mass. (9 Cush.) 482, 483.

"Debtor," as used in a statute authorizing the garnishment of the debtors of execution defendants, does not include a person with whom the debtor has made a special deposit of coin. Wood v. Edgar, 13 Mo. 451, 452.

As used in the Connecticut foreign attachment law, a debtor was construed to include an absent person liable for damages or breach of covenant. Pollard v. Dwight, 8 U. S. (4 Cranch) 421, 2 L. Ed. 668.

Assignor synonyms.

Section 3, subd. 5, of the act relating to assignments for the benefit of creditors, provides that the debtor should make an inventory of his property within a certain time after making the assignment, and, in case he shall fail to do so within such time, that the assignee shall then make a schedule, and that, if he should fail to do so, he shall be removed by the judge, and then further provides that "the books and papers of such delinquent debtor shall at all times be subject to the inspection and examination of any creditor," and "the county judge is authorized by order to require such debtor or assignor to allow such inspection or examination." Held that, by providing that the books and papers should "at all times be subject to inspection," an intention was expressed that the words "debtor" and "delinquent debtor," should be taken as synonymous with "assignor," and that such inspection might be made by a creditor prior to the refusal of the debtor to make the inventory, as well as after such refusal. In re H. Herrmann Lumber Co., 48 N. Y. Supp. 509, 510, 21 App. Div. 514.

Bankrupt.

A bankrupt, in the sense of the bankruptcy act, is a debtor, and something more. He is a debtor who has committed an act of bankruptcy, declared to be such by the bankruptcy law. Consequently section 44 of the bankruptcy act of 1867, providing for the punishment of any fraudulent disposition of the goods of a debtor or bankrupt within 3 months next before the commencement of bankruptcy proceedings, refers not only to bankrupts, but to those who had not at the time of committing the offense become bankrupt. United States v. Pusey (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 631, 633.

Corporation.

Rev. Code 1819, c. 123, directing the method of proceeding in courts of equity against absent debtors, includes corporations. United States Bank v. Merchants' Bank, 40 Va. 573, 576.

The term "debtor," as used in a statute authorizing the attachment of the property of a debtor, includes a corporation, as well as a natural person. South Carolina R. Co. v. McDonald, 5 Ga. 531, 535. Contra, see McQueen v. Middletown Mfg. Co. (N. Y.) 16 Johns. 5.

Within the provisions of Civ. Code, § 3432, providing that a debtor may pay one of the creditors in preference to another, or may give to one creditor security for the payment of his demand in preference to another, the term "debtor" is a broad one, and must include corporations likewise with individuals and partnerships. Merced Bank v. Ivett, 59 Pac. 393, 394, 127 Cal. 134.

The term "debtor," as used in insolvency law, includes partnerships and corporations. In re Levin (Cal.) 63 Pac. 335, 336.

Heirs.

Rev. Laws, p. 335, § 1, providing that, if any creditor shall make oath, etc., that his debtor absconds from his creditors, it shall be the duty of the clerk to issue a writ of attachment, does not include an heir of an ancestor who was a creditor of a person making such affidavit; for thus to consider him would make him liable at all events for the debt of his ancestor, whether he had land by descent or not. Peacock v. Wildes, 8 N. J. Law (3 Halst.) 179, 180.

Indorser of note.

A debtor is defined to be one who owes a debt; one who is indebted. Webst. Dict. The term would include an indorser of a promissory note before his liability became absolute by dishonor and notice. Dodson v. Taylor, 21 Atl. 293, 294, 53 N. J. Law (24 Vroom) 200.

Nonresident.

The term "debtor not found or summoned," in a statute authorizing service by publication of notice of attachment when the debtor has not been found or summoned, applies as well to a nonresident as to absconding or fraudulent debtors. It includes every debtor described in the seven enumerations of causes of attachment in the second article of the attachment law. Moore v. Williams, 44 Miss. 61, 63.

Personal representative.

Though the act of 1873 contained no express provisions for the revival of a judgment against the executor of a deceased judgment debtor, the word "debtor," in the phrase "by service of summons on the debtor," includes the personal representative of a deceased judgment debtor; the word "debtor" being used as a generic term, in a condensed and general form, to embrace all proceedings necessary. Chester & C. R. Co. v. Marshall, 18 S. E. 247, 249, 40 S. C. 59.

Individual partner.

Each partner of a firm is not a debtor for the amount of the partnership debt, in such sense that a creditor may proceed against him in attachment, if the rest of the partners are in the state. The individual partner will be liable and bound to the extent of his separate property for the partnership debts, but he is only constructively or consequentially a debtor. They are not his debts, strictly speaking, though he is liable for them. Hollingshead v. Curtis, 14 N. J. Law (2 J. S. Green) 402, 409.

DEBTOR'S LIBERTIES.

Jail yard synonymous, see "Jail Yard."

DEBTS TO BE FIRST PAID.

"Debts to be first paid," as used in a will, could not be construed as an implied power given to the personal representative to sell land for the payment of debts. Owen v. Ellis, 64 Mo. 77, 88.

DECAY.

Decay is defined to be a gradual failure of health, strength, soundness, prosperity; any species of excellence or perfection declined to a worse or less perfect state. Fisk v. Spring (N. Y.) 25 Hun, 367, 369, 62 How. Prac. 510, 512.

Under a clause in a policy of insurance providing that "if the vessel, after regular survey, should be condemned for being unsound or rotten, the assurers shall not be bound to pay their subscription," a finding on a survey that her stern, apron, bends, and the most part of her timbers are decayed is equivalent to finding that the vessel is unsound or rotten, although those terms are not used, as "decayed" is the same as "rotten." Steinmetz v. United States Ins. Co. (Pa.) 2 Serg. & R. 293, 296.

DECEASE.

Webster defines the word "decease" as follows: "To depart from this life; to die." The word "decease" cannot be construed to include the civil death of one sentenced to state prison for life. In re Zeph's Estate, 3 N. Y. Supp. 460, 50 Hun, 523.

A will providing that, after the death of testator's daughter, the residue and remainder of his property should go to his surviving grandchildren, and to the legal issue of "any deceased grandchild or grandchildren," means such as may die during the life of one or both of the daughters. Scott v. West, 25 N. W. 18, 20, 63 Wis. 529.

In a will in which the testator divided his estate between his three children, with a proviso that, in the event of the decease of either of them without having issue at his or her decease, the portion of said deceased is to be shared equally by the survivors or their issue, the words "in the event of the decease" meant the decease of either of the legatees before the decease of the testator, and were not words limiting the estate devised to the life of the legatees. Phelps v. Phelps, 11 Atl. 596, 597, 55 Conn. 359.

In a will in which testator bequeathed his residuary personality to trustees in trust for the children of one L., to be divided equally between them, and directing that in case of the decease of either of them, leaving a family, then such share as the parents would have taken should be equally divided amongst the children of such deceased parents, the term "decease" means decease during the testator's life—that the children of L. who survived the testator took absolutely, and that the children of one child of L., who died between the date of the will and the death of the testator, took the share that his parent would have taken if living at his death. Rickards v. Gray (Del.) 6 Houst. 232, 271.

"The issue of any deceased child," in a will in which testator directs that the interest of a sum of money shall be paid to his son A. for life, and on A.'s death that the principal shall be divided among testator's other then surviving children and issue of any deceased child, includes the issue of A. Bell v. Smalley, 18 Atl. 70, 45 N. J. Eq. (18 Stew.) 478.

DECEDENT.

The word "decendent," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 2660 et seq., relating to the granting of letters of administration upon the estate of a decedent, should be construed in its usual and ordinary sense, which, as defined by Webster, means a deceased person—that is, one dead; departed from this life. Hence one, though civilly dead, by reason of imprisonment for life, is not a decedent, within the meaning of the statute. In re Zeph's Estate, 3 N. Y. Supp. 460, 50 Hun, 523.

The word "decendent" means either a testator or a person dying intestate. Pub. Gen. Laws Md. 1888, p. 2, art. 1, § 5.

DECEIT.

Action for, see "Action for Deceit or Fraud."

"Deceit, in business transactions, consists in fraudulent representations or contrivances by which one man deceives another who has a right to rely on the representations, or has no means of detecting such fraud." Reynolds v. Palmer (U. S.) 21 Fed. 433, 434.

Deceit is a fraudulent and cheating misrepresentation, artifice, or device used by one or more persons to deceive and trick another, who is ignorant of the true facts, to the prejudice and damage of the party imposed on. French v. Vining, 102 Mass. 132, 135, 3 Am. Rep. 440 (citing Black, Dict.).

"Deceit is a fraudulent misrepresentation by which one man deceives another to the injury of the latter. Where false statements are made with intent to deceive and defraud, the necessary implication is that the person making such false statements with such intent has knowledge of their falsity." Farwell v. Metcalf, 61 Ill. 372, 374.

"Deceit" is a species of fraud, and consists of any false representation or contrivance whereby one person overreaches and misleads another to his hurt. Swift v. Rounds, 35 Atl. 45, 19 R. I. 527, 33 L. R. A. 561, 61 Am. St. Rep. 791.

The phrase "legal fraud" has sometimes been interpreted as meaning fraud by construction, and as indicating that something less than actual fraud may sustain an action for deceit; but, to sustain an action for deceit, intentional fraud must be shown, as fraud without damage, or damage without fraud, gives no cause of action, but, when these two concur, an action lies. Kountze v. Kennedy, 41 N. E. 414, 147 N. Y. 124, 29 L. R. A. 360, 49 Am. St. Rep. 651.

"Deceit," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 67, providing that an attorney or counselor who is guilty of any deceit may be suspended from practice or removed from office by the Supreme Court at a general term, implies concealment or false suggestion of an attorney or counselor to injure a party or mislead a court while acting in a professional capacity or in the course of professional employment. In re Post, 7 N. Y. Supp. 438, 54 Hun, 634.

Where an attorney procured a pension for his client, and received the arrears, amounting to about $1,700, and retained $1,200, under an alleged agreement with his client that he was to retain all over $8 per month that was recovered, and it did not appear that the client was informed as to the amount recovered, it constituted deceit and malpractice, under a statute authorizing disbarment for such offenses. In re —, 86 N. Y. 563, 574.

The term "deceit," in Code, § 67, providing that an attorney or counselor who is guilty of any deceit, etc., may be suspended or removed, implies concealment or false suggestion as an attorney or counselor to injure a party or mislead the court while acting in a professional capacity, or in the course of professional employment. In re Post, 7 N. Y. Supp. 438, 54 Hun, 634.

In the application of the rule that if a lessor has knowledge of defects in the premises which are not discoverable by the tenant, and which will imperil his person or property, a liability arises from the fraudulent concealment thereof, the terms "fraud," "fraudulent concealment," "constructive fraud," and "deceit" are synonymous. Shinkle, Wilson & Kreis Co. v. Birney & Seymour, 67 N. E. 715, 716, 68 Ohio St. 323.

A "deceit" is either (1) the suggestion as a fact of that which is not true by one who does not believe it to be true; (2) the assertion as a fact of that which is not true by one who has no reasonable grounds for believing it to be true; (3) the suppression of a fact by one who is bound to disclose it, or who gives information of other facts which are likely to mislead for want of communication of that fact; or (4) a promise made without any intention of performing it. Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 2292; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 3942; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1293; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 835. Under such a definition, a complaint alleging that plaintiff bought a county warrant from defendant upon defendant's representation that it had a legal, bona fide charge against the county, whereas defendant well knew that the warrant was illegal, and that payment thereof would be enjoined, is a sufficient allegation of deceit. Parker v. Ausland, 82 N. W. 402, 403, 13 S. D. 169.

Alteration of court order.

While many definitions of "deceit" are given in the books, and in some that a person practicing deceit must accomplish something in the way of damage to another, it does not seem to me that it necessarily follows that a party may not be guilty of deceit, in a criminal sense, even though no damage results. As used in Pen. Code, § 148, providing that an attorney or counselor who is guilty of any deceit or collusion with intent to deceive the court or any party is guilty of a misdemeanor, it means the quality of being false or misleading. The concealment or perversion of the truth; a trick or device which tends to mislead another, although not necessarily accomplishing that result. When a person uses means which are deceitful, or which tend to deceive the court or another person, such as writing or producing false papers, it would be too strict a definition to hold that, although he intended to deceive, but as he failed in accomplishing any result, he was not, in fact, guilty of using deceit. In Looft v. Lawton, 14 Hun, 588, the courts say that there seems to be no good reason for confining deceit to common-law or statutory cheats. The common law, as well as the statute of obtaining property by false pretenses, was adequate to the punishment of all such offenses, whether committed by lawyers or laymen. To mislead a court or jury is to deceive it, and, if knowingly done, constitutes criminal deceit. The alteration of an order of the Surrogate's Court so as to make it false and misleading is a deceit, within the statute. People v. Oishei, 45 N. Y. Supp. 49, 52, 20 Misc. Rep. 163.

As cheating by false tokens.

"Deceit," as used in Act 1836 (Rev. St. c. 35, § 8), providing that in all trespasses and other misdemeanors, except the offenses of perjury, forgery, malicious mischief, and deceit, prosecution shall commence within two years after the commission, means the same as cheating by false tokens, which is a distinct offense from that of a conspiracy to commit a fraud or cheat or deceive. State v. Christianbury, 44 N. C. 46, 47.

False answer.

Interposing a verified false answer is not deceit or abuse of a mandate or proceeding of the court, punishable under Code Civ. Proc. § 14, subd. 2, as a contempt, since a false answer does not in any sense deceive the court. Fromme v. Gray, 43 N. E. 215, 216, 148 N. Y. 695.

Silence.

Deceit may sometimes take a negative form, and there may be circumstances where silence would have all the legal characteristics of actual misrepresentations. French v. Vining, 102 Mass. 132, 135, 3 Am. Rep. 440.

Decelt may consist in either the suppression of the truth, or the suggestion of a falsehood. Brown v. Manning, 3 Minn. 35, 44 (Gil. 13, 15), 74 Am. Dec. 736.

DECEITFUL PLEA.

A deceitful plea is the sham plea mentioned in the English books, and is when the facts stated are obviously false on the face of the plea. Gray v. Gidiere (S. C.) 4 Strob. 438, 443.

DECEIVE.

In Civ. Code, § 1709, providing that one who willfully deceives another, with intent to induce him to alter his position to his injury or risk, is liable for any damages he thereby suffers, "deceive" means the suggesting as a fact that which is not true by one who does not believe it to be true. Daley v. Quick, 33 Pac. 859, 862, 99 Cal. 179.

DECEPTION.

Deception is the act of deceiving. The intentional misleading of another by falsehood spoken or acted. Suther v. State, 24 South. 43, 44, 46, 118 Ala. 88; Hall v. State, 32 South. 750, 759, 134 Ala. 90.

DECENCY.

The power of a town to enact ordinances for the preservation of good order, decency, and decorum within its limits is sufficient to authorize the town to pass an ordinance prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors therein; the sale of such liquors being prohibited in the rest of the county. Fortner v. Duncan, 15 S. W. 55, 91 Ky. 171, 11 L. R. A. 188.

DECIDE.

To decide is to determine; to form a definite opinion. Darden v. Lines, 2 Fla. 569, 571 (citing Webst. Dict.).

As used in St. 1855, c. 152, declaring it to be the duty of the jury, after having received the instructions of the court, to decide, at their discretion, by general verdict, both the law and the facts involved in the issue, or to find a special verdict, at their election, to "decide" includes the power and the right to deliberate, to weigh the reasons for and against, to see which preponderates, and to be governed by that preponderance. The word is used in the same sense as it is employed in that part of the statute making it the duty of the court to decide on the admission and rejection of evidence. Commonwealth v. Anthes, 71 Mass. (5 Gray) 185, 253.

Where the record shows that the tax board met to levy taxes, and "decide" what should be the rate of taxation for various purposes, such act was a levy of the required tax. Tallman v. Cooke, 43 Iowa, 330, 331.

Within Rev. St. 1889, § 4707, providing that, in every case of a pending contesting election, the person holding the certificate of election may perform the duty of the office until the contest shall be decided, the word "decided" will be held to mean the entry of a final judgment against him in the trial court, so that his right to the office terminates then, and does not refer to a decision on appeal. State ex rel. Craig v. Woodson, 31 S. W. 105, 107, 128 Mo. 497.

The phrase, "If they [the court] decide the public good requires the proposed railroad, the Secretary of State shall issue to the corporation a certificate," etc., as used in Pub. St. c. 156, does not mean, "If they find as a fact," etc., nor does it mean, "If the referees find as a fact," there must be a judicial decision—a judgment or decree—conclusively establishing the public need of the proposed railroad. Facts are not established by the findings of referees, judges acting as triers of fact, or by the verdict of a jury, but by a judgment on the report, finding, or verdict. Clough v. Moore, 63 N. H. 111, 113. The court, in each case alike, must decide—i. e., adjudge—whether the facts are lawfully and properly found, and all other questions raised by the petition or other form of proceeding. "If they render judgment" may be a more technical, as well as more cumbersome, mode of expression, but does not so differ in meaning from "if they decide." By Webster "to decide" is defined, "To render judgment." Internat. Dict. A decision is "a judgment of a court." Rap. & L. Law Dict. In re Milford & M. R. R., 36 Atl. 545, 548, 68 N. H. 570.

Under a statute providing that no judge shall decide or take part in the decision of any question which shall have been argued when he was not present as a judge, the fact that a judge was present as one of the judges of the court, but did not hear the argument, while the other two judges, who did hear the argument, made the decision, did not make the judgment invalid on the ground that the third judge assisted to decide the case. Corn-ing v. Slosson, 16 N. Y. 294, 296.

A notice by town surveyors that they will meet on a certain day, at a place named, to make an examination and survey of a proposed highway, is not in compliance with Rev. St. c. 16, § 53, requiring them to give notice of a time and place at which they will meet and decide on such application. Austin v. Allen, 6 Wis. 134, 141.

DECIDED UPON LEGAL PRINCIPLES.

A direction by a court to referees that the matters submitted to them for decision are to be decided upon legal principles is construed as directory, and leaves the judgment of the referees conclusive as to the law. Walker v. Simpson, 13 Atl. 580, 582, 80 Me. 143.

DECIDED UPON PRINCIPLES OF JUSTICE AND GOOD FAITH.

A special act authorizing the complainant to file a bill as in chancery against the state, and requiring the cause "to be decided upon principles of justice and good faith," will be construed as intending to relieve the complainant of all technical objections that might arise in a proceeding according to the known usages of law and chancery, and as conferring power upon the court to examine the claim in the same spirit of liberality which would be proper for the general assembly to exercise. Seely v. State, 11 Ohio, 501, 502, 507, 12 Ohio, 496, 523.

DECISION.

See "Final Decision"; "Judicial Decision."

Of benefit association.

The expulsion of a member of a benefit association without notice and hearing is not a decision, within the constitution of the order, providing that any member aggrieved by a decision of the order may appeal within three months to the grand committee. Kohler v. Klein, 79 N. Y. Supp. 866, 89 Misc. Rep. 353.

Of collector of customs.

"Decision," as used in Act Cong. 1864, § 14, providing that the "decision of the collector of customs" shall be conclusive, unless the party, if dissatisfied with his decision, gives notice thereof within 10 days after the ascertainment and liquidation of the duties by the proper officers of the customs, and within 30 days after the date of such ascertainment and liquidation appeals therefrom to the Secretary of the Treasury, is equivalent to, and synonymous with, "ascertainment and liquidation of the duties by the proper officers of the customs." Such ascertainment and liquidation of the duties by the proper officers of the customs (that is, the proper officers in the collector's office or department) is the decision of the collector. When the duties are ascertained and liquidated in the usual manner by such officers, and the usual indicia thereof, by checks and stamps, are placed on the usual papers in the collector's office, such transaction is the decision of the collector of customs in the premises. United States v. Cousinery (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 677, 679.

Rev. St. § 2931, requiring an importer suing to recover an assessment of duties within 90 days after the "decision on the appeal" to the Secretary of State, is not restricted to a decision on the merits of the claim thereby presented, but includes the decision on the sufficiency of the appeal itself. The John Shillito v. McClung (U. S.) 51 Fed. 868, 874, 2 C. C. A. 526.

The ascertainment and liquidation of duties by the collector is a decision, within the meaning of the customs administrative act of June 10, 1890, c. 407, §§ 13, 14, 26 Stat. 136, 137 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, pp. 1932, 1933]. United States v. Beebe (U. S.) 117 Fed. 670, 679.

Of county commissioners.

"Decision," as used in Pol. Code, c. 20, § 46, providing that from all decisions of the board of county commissioners on matters properly before them there shall be allowed an appeal to the District Court by any person aggrieved, means the determination of the board on matters of a quasi judicial character, and not those of an executive, administrative, or legislative character, and includes the decisions of the board sitting as a board of equalization, since they are quasi judicial. The word "decision" is a very comprehensive term. Webster defines it to be an account or report of a conclusion—especially of a legal adjudication, as a decision of arbitrators; a decision of the Supreme Court. Taken in its common and most comprehensive meaning, it would include every determination of the board in the construction of the question before them, but such is not its meaning in the statute. Pierre Waterworks Co. v. Hughes County, 37 N. W. 733, 739, 5 Dak. 145.

"Decision" as used in Rev. St. 1894, § 7858 (Rev. St. 1881, § 5771), providing for appeals from all decisions of the county commissioners from allowances, etc., does not include actions by the board in matters of a purely ministerial or business character, wherein the board acts solely as a corporation, and not as a court, and not judicially, and does not include an order directing the property of a county to be insured in certain companies, though allowances are made for the payment of the premiums. Potts v. Bennett, 39 N. E. 518, 520, 140 Ind. 71.

An order of sale made by the board of county commissioners, selling certain stock owned by the county, is not a decision, within the meaning a statute authorizing appeals from the decisions of county commissioners in a large class of cases. 1 Rev. St. 1876, p. 357, § 31. The discretionary power of county commissioners over the property of their respective counties has been held to be analogous to the legislative power possessed by many municipal bodies, and is distinguishable from the judicial or quasi judicial powers conferred upon such commissioners.

O'Boyle v. Shannon, 80 Ind. 159, 161 (citing Hanna v. Putnam County Com'rs, 29 Ind. 170).

Of pension board.

Within the meaning of the statute prohibiting the bribery of a United States officer with intent to influence his decision or action on any question, matter, or proceeding, the certificate which a pension board is required to make out is, in effect, both a decision of the board and an action by the board and the members thereof upon the question or matter submitted to them for their official action and decision. It is true that the board of surgeons cannot decide the question of the granting or increasing of a pension, nor do they finally decide the rating of the applicant; but they are required to thoroughly examine the claimant, and to give a certificate containing a full description of the physical condition of the claimant, and of all structural changes. This requires of the board a proper consideration of the symptoms or evidences of disease or disability, and the result thereof is a decision of the board upon the question of the claimant's physical condition. United States v. Van Leuven (U. S.) 62 Fed. 62, 66.

DECISION (Of Court).

The word "decision," as used in Const. 1894, art. 6, § 9, providing that "no unanimous decision of the Appellate Division that there is evidence sustaining or tending to sustain the finding of fact or a verdict not directed by the court shall be reviewed by the Court of Appeals," applies to special proceedings as well as to actions. It is not confined to judgments or orders, but covers both. People v. Barker, 46 N. E. 875, 880, 152 N. Y. 417.

Within the provisions of St. 1879, § 408, providing that an exception to a decision or a verdict on the ground that it is not supported by the evidence cannot be reviewed on appeal, unless, etc., the verdict or decision referred to relates exclusively to findings alleged to be erroneous for want of sufficient support in the evidence. Kleinschmidt v. McAndrews, 6 Sup. Ct. 761, 763, 117 U. S. 282, 29 L. Ed. 903.

Dismissal of action.

Gen. St. 1878, c. 66, § 253, providing that a verdict, report, or decision may be vacated and a new trial granted on the ground that the verdict, report, or decision is not justified by the evidence, should be construed to include the dismissal of an action for insufficiency of evidence. Volmer v. Satgerman, 25 Minn. 234, 245.

Dismissal of appeal.

Laws 1860, c. 264, § 7, provides that the clerk of the Supreme Court shall remit to the court from which an appeal was taken the papers transmitted to the Supreme Court on the appeal, together with the judgment or decision of the Supreme Court thereon, within 30 days after the same shall have been made, etc. Held, that the term "decision," as used in such act, included an order dismissing the appeal, and, after the entry of such order, it was the duty of the clerk to remit the papers to the court within 30 days after the order was entered. Estey v. Sheckler, 36 Wis. 434, 436.

As final decision.

Code Civ. Proc. § 279, defining an exception as being an objection taken on the trial to a decision on a matter of law at any time from the calling of the action for trial to the rendition of the verdict or decision, means final decision. Kleinschmidt v. McAndrews, 5 Pac. 281, 286, 4 Mont. 8.

The word "decision" has no fixed legal meaning. It may be a final judgment, or a mere determination or opinion, or even a report of an opinion; but as used in Code, § 227, declaring that the decision of a referee shall stand as the decision of the court, the word does not mean a mere interlocutory decision in the progress of a cause as to the admission or rejection of evidence, etc., but refers to that part of the decision of the referee which states his conclusions of law. Deming v. Post (N. Y.) 1 Code Rep. City Ct. R. 121.

A bond on appeal to the Supreme Court contained the conditions required by Gen. St. c. 86, § 10, and, in addition, obligated the sureties "to pay the amount, if any, which shall be finally recovered in such municipal court against defendant after the decision of said Supreme Court." The appeal was dismissed, on motion of the respondent, for failure of appellant to serve his paper book and points and authorities as required by rules 7 and 13 of the Supreme Court. Held, that the term "decision," as used in such extra condition, meant a final decision on the merits, and thereby, by reason of such extra condition, the plaintiff was entitled to recover from the sureties on the bond the amount of the judgment subsequently entered in the municipal court, unappealed from. Kimball Printing Co. v. Southern Land Improvement Co., 58 N. W. 868, 869, 57 Minn. 37.

As finding of facts and conclusions of law.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1033, requires the party in whose favor judgment is rendered to file and serve a memorandum of his costs and disbursements within five days after notice of the decision of the court, when the case is tried without a jury. Held, that the word "decision" means the findings of the facts and conclusions of law signed by the court and filed with the clerk as a basis of the judgment entered. Porter v. Hopkins, 63 Cal. 53, 55. "Decision," as used in Code Civ.

Proc. § 1068, providing that the party in whose favor judgment is rendered, and who claims his costs, must deliver to the clerk and serve on the adverse party, within five days after the verdict or notice of the decision of the court or referee, a memorandum of the items of his costs and necessary disbursements in the action or proceeding, means the finding of facts and conclusions of law signed by the court and filed with the clerk as the basis of the judgment. Mullally v. Irish-American Ben. Soc., 11 Pac. 215, 216, 69 Cal. 559.

The word "decision," as used in a statement of the grounds of a motion for a new trial that the evidence was insufficient to justify the "decision," includes not only the conclusions of law, but the facts found. Hibernia Sav. & Loan Soc. v. Moore, 8 Pac. 824, 825, 68 Cal. 156.

As finding of facts by the court.

The word "decision," as used in statutes providing that an application for a new trial must be made at the term the verdict or decision is rendered, is used in the sense of "finding on the facts," where the cause is tried by the court. Wilson v. Vance, 55 Ind. 394, 396; Rodefer v. Fletcher, 89 Ind. 563, 564; Evansville & R. R. Co. v. Maddux, 83 N. E. 845, 846, 184 Ind. 571; Allen v. Adams, 50 N. E. 387, 388, 150 Ind. 409; Clement, Bane & Co. v. Hartzell, 56 Pac. 504, 505, 60 Kan. 317; Corbett v. Twenty-Third St. Ry. Co., 21 N. E. 1033, 1034, 114 N. Y. 579. Such is likewise its meaning as used in statutes making it a cause for new trial that the verdict or decision is not sustained by sufficient evidence or is contrary to law. Hubbs v. State, 50 N. E. 402, 20 Ind. App. 181; Gates v. Baltimore & O. S. W. Ry. Co., 56 N. E. 722, 724, 154 Ind. 338; Weaver v. Apple, 46 N. E. 642, 643, 147 Ind. 304.

The word "decision," when used in connection with a trial or other inquiry or a judgment, means the decision of the court upon a hearing, or the trial of an issue before the court without a jury. Code Civ. Proc. N. Y. 1899, § 3343, subd. 5.

Within the meaning of Code Civ. Proc. § 763, providing that if either party to an action die after a verdict or decision, or before final judgment is entered, the court must enter final judgment in the name of the original parties, the word "decision" refers to a decision made by the court upon a trial of issues without a jury. Corbett v. Twenty-Third St. Ry. Co., 114 N. Y. 579, 21 N. E. 1033. Thus an affirmance by a general term upon the hearing and trial of the issues is a decision. Peetsch v. Quinn, 26 N. Y. Supp. 728, 729, 6 Misc. Rep. 50.

Findings synonymous.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1171, providing that a new trial may be had on the ground of "insufficiency of evidence to justify the verdict or other decision," a notice of intention to move for a new trial on the ground that the evidence was insufficient "to justify the finding and judgment," is sufficient, for the word "finding," as used in the notice, is equivalent to the word "decision," as used in the statute, a new trial being the re-examination of an issue of fact after trial and decision. Cobban v. Hecklen, 70 Pac. 805, 809, 27 Mont. 245.

Findings distinguished.

"Decision," as used in Prac. Act, § 195 (Comp. Laws, § 1258), requiring the party moving for a new trial to give notice of his intention within 10 days after receiving written notice of the rendering of the decision of the judge, is the announcement by the court of its judgment, and is distinct from the findings. The decision may be rendered after or before the filing of findings, or, as is frequently the case, no findings may be made. Elder v. Frevert, 3 Pac. 237, 238, 18 Nev. 278.

Judgment synonymous.

The "decision" of a court is its judgment. Adams v. Yazoo & M. V. R. Co., 24 South. 317, 318, 77 Miss. 194, 60 L. R. A. 33.

A "decision" is a judgment of a court. Rap. & L. Law Dict. Webster defines "to decide" as "to render judgment." Internat. Dict. There is no substantial difference between the phrase "a petition for a decision of the question," as used in Pub. St. c. 156, § 8, providing that a provisional corporation may file in the office of the clerk of the Supreme Court a petition to the court for a decision of the question whether the public good requires the proposed railroad, and the phrase "a petition to determine the question," as used in Laws 1883, § 7. Each asks for an adjudication. In re Milford & M. R. R., 36 Atl. 545, 548, 68 N. H. 570.

Within Code Civ. Proc. § 4408, providing that an application for a new trial must be made at the term at which the verdict, report, or decision is rendered, the word "decision" has the same meaning as the word "judgment." A decision of the court is its judgment. Board of Education of City of Emporia v. State, 52 Pac. 466, 467, 7 Kan. App. 620.

The terms "judgment," "decree," "decision," and "order" are more or less cognate as applied in legal proceedings, and closely allied in meaning, especially under our system of practice, where we do not distinguish between forms of actions at law or suits in chancery. We generally, almost invariably, both bench and bar, express or refer to the judicial determination of the controversy by the word "judgment." The term "order" is not infrequently used in a more restricted sense than the word "judgment." It may be defined to be a command, direction, or decision of the court or judge on some intermediate point or issue in the case, but without finally disposing of the main issue or issues in the cause. Then it is merely interlocutory, but the term is sometimes given a more extensive signification, even in legal controversies, and is occasionally used as a synonym of "judgment" or "decree." A "judgment" is a final determination of a cause given by any competent tribunal. Judgments, like decrees, are either final or interlocutory, and in the latter sense also include orders. A judgment is the decision or sentence of the law pronounced by a court, or other competent tribunal, upon the matter contained in the record. According to the common-law rule, by a "final judgment" is to be understood, not a final determination of the rights of the parties, but merely of the particular suit or controversy depending between them before the court. A "decision" has been defined to be a judgment given by a competent tribunal. This word also includes in legal parlance both orders and judgments, as well as the report or account of the opinions or judicial determinations of courts. A decree is the judgment or sentence of a court of equity. It is either interlocutory or final. It embraces, therefore, orders as well as decrees in equity or admiralty. Hence a bond conditioned merely for the performance of the decree or judgment is sufficient, under a statute providing that the appeal bond shall be conditioned that the appellant perform the decision, order, decree, or judgment of the district court, the word "judgment" and the word "decree" both being broad enough to include decisions and orders. Halbert v. Alford (Tex.) 16 S. W. 814, 815.

In the abstract sense, there is a shade of difference between the import of the word "decision" and the word "judgment," as expressed by Abbott's Law Dict. 351. The decision is the resolution of the principles which determine the controversy; the judgment is the formal paper applying them to the rights of the parties. But the same author gives the general definition of "decision" as the result of the deliberations of a tribunal; the "judgment" is the determination of the question or case. The term "judgment" may properly be used in a motion for new trial, though the statute on which the motion is based provides that a new trial may be granted when the verdict, report, or decision is not sustained by sufficient evidence, or is contrary to law. Buckeye Pipe Line Co. v. Fee, 57 N. E. 446, 447, 62 Ohio St. 543, 78 Am. St. Rep. 743.

Law distinguished.

The decisions of courts are not the law. They are only evidences of the law, and this evidence is stronger or weaker according to the number and uniformity of adjudications, the unanimity or dissension of the judges, the solidity of the reasons on which the decisions are founded, and the perspicuity and precision with which those reasons are expressed. The weight and authority of judicial decisions depend also on the character and temper of the times in which they are pronounced. An adjudication at a moment when turbulent passions or revolutionary frenzies prevail deserves much less respect than if it were made at a season propitious to impartial inquiry and calm deliberation. The peculiar organization and practice of this court renders it difficult to establish a system of precedents. In the supreme courts the judges confer together, compare opinions, weigh each other's reasons, and elicit light from each other. If they agree, one is usually delegated by the others not only to pronounce judgment, but to assign reasons for the whole bench. In the court of errors the members never hold any previous consultation together. They vote for the most part as in a legislative capacity. Few assign any reasons, and fewer still give written opinions which may be reported. For these reasons it would be extravagant and dangerous to consider the dicta and opinions of a single member as settling definitely the law of the land on all the points on which he chooses to give opinions or to assign reasons. Yates v. Lansing (N. Y.) 9 Johns. 395, 415, 6 Am. Dec. 290. See, also, United States Savings & Loan Co. v. Harris (U. S.) 113 Fed. 27, 35; Swift v. Tyson, 41 U. S. (16 Pet.) 1, 18, 10 L. Ed. 865; Phipps v. Harding (U. S.) 70 Fed. 468, 473, 17 C. C. A. 203, 30 L. R. A. 513; Falconer v. Simmons, 41 S. E. 193, 194, 51 W. Va. 172.

The term "law" includes decisions of the courts. Miller v. Dunn, 14 Pac. 27, 29, 72 Cal. 462, 1 Am. St. Rep. 67; Nelson v. Kerr (N. Y.) 2 Thomp. & C. 299, 301.

The thirty-fourth section of the judiciary act of 1789, c. 20, provides that "the laws of the several states, except where the Constitution and treaties or statutes of the United States shall otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law in the courts of the United States, in cases where they apply," and it was claimed that this furnished a rule obligatory on the court to follow the decisions of the state tribunals in all cases to which they apply. In order to maintain the argument, it is essential, therefore, to hold that the word "laws" in this section includes within the scope of its meaning decisions of the local tribunals. In the ordinary use of language, it will hardly be contended that the decisions of courts constitute "laws." They are, at most, only evidence of what the laws are, and are not of themselves laws. The laws of a state are more usually understood to mean the rules and enactments promulgated by the legislative authority thereof, or long-established local customs having the force of laws. In all the various cases which have hitherto come before us for decision, this court had uniformly supposed that the true interpretation of this section limited its application to state laws strictly local; that is to say, to the positive statutes of the state and the construction thereof adopted by the local tribunals, and to rights and titles to things having a permanent locality, such as the rights and titles to real estate, and other matters immovable and intraterritorial in their nature and character. It never has been supposed by us that the section did apply or was designed to apply to questions of a more general nature, not at all depending upon local statutes or local usages of a fixed and permanent operation, as, for example, to the construction of ordinary contracts or other written instruments, and especially to questions of general commercial laws, where the state tribunals are called upon to perform the like functions as ourselves; that is, to ascertain, upon general reasoning and legal analogies, what is the true exposition of the contract or instrument, or what is the just rule furnished by the principles of commercial law to govern the case. Swift v. Tyson, 41 U. S. (16 Pet.) 1, 18, 19, 10 L. Ed. 865.

Ministerial act.

The refusal of a judge to do a ministerial act, such as to issue a certificate of competency to teach, is not a "ruling or decision," within Sayles' Civ. St. art. 3715, providing that the state superintendent shall hear and determine all appeals from the "rulings and decisions" of subordinate school officers. Cruse v. McQueen (Tex.) 25 S. W. 711, 712.

"Decisions," as used in Code, § 875, providing that the decisions of the county court given or made in the transaction of county business shall only be reviewed by the writ of review provided by the Code, means those judicial in their nature or character, and which concern public affairs. When the law prescribes the services of an officer and the fees to be paid therefor, and declares that the county must pay such fees when the services are rendered the county, the county court, as the agent of the county, has nothing to do but to pay such fees. The occasion is not one which confers jurisdiction on the county court to render a decision either for or against its principal. Crossen v. Wasco County, 10 Or. 111, 114.

Opinion synonymous.

The terms "opinion" and "decision" are sometimes used interchangeably in the Code. The provision in section 1846 is that the prosecuting attorney may except to any "opinion" of the court and reserve a point of law for the decision of the Supreme Court, and in section 1845 it is provided that a defendant may take an exception to any decision of the court; so that an exception to the opinion of the court overruling a motion for a new trial is sufficient as an exception to the decision as required by statute. Pierce v. State, 10 N. E. 302, 303, 109 Ind. 535.

Opinion distinguished.

"The terms 'opinion' and 'decision' are often confounded, yet there is a wide difference between them, and in ignorance of this, or by overlooking it, what has been a mere revision of an opinion has been sometimes regarded as a mutilation of a record. A decision of the court is its judgment; the opinion is the reasons given for that judgment. The former is entered of record immediately upon its rendition, and can only be changed through a regular application to the court upon a petition for a rehearing or a modification. The latter is the property of the judges, subject to their revision, correction, and modification in any particular deemed advisable, until, with the approbation of the writer, it is transcribed in the records." The term "opinion," in a legal sense, so far as it applies to judges and courts, has a well-defined meaning, which is given in Webster's International Dictionary as "the expression of views of the judge." Craig v. Bennett, 62 N. E. 273, 274, 158 Ind. 9; Houston v. Williams, 13 Cal. 24, 27, 73 Am. Dec. 565; Coffey v. Gamble, 91 N. W. 813, 814, 117 Iowa, 545.

A "decision" embraces the findings of the court upon which a decree or judgment may be entered. It differs from an "opinion," which contains the views of a judge in relation to a given subject. In re Winslow's Estate, 34 N. Y. Supp. 637, 638, 12 Misc. Rep. 254.

The terms "opinion" and "decision" are sometimes used interchangeably in the statute. The provision in section 1846 is that the prosecuting attorney may except to any opinion of the court and reserve a point of law for the decision of the Supreme Court, and in section 1845 it is provided that a defendant may take an exception to any decision of the court; so that an exception to the opinion of the court overruling a motion for a new trial is sufficient as an exception to the decision as required by statute. Pierce v. State, 10 N. E. 302, 303, 109 Ind. 535.

"Decision," as used in Prac. Act, § 182, defining the findings of fact and conclusions of law of the district judge as a "written decision," means something which must precede the judgment, and upon which it is entered as upon the verdict of a jury, and is something different than the written opinion referred to in section 340, relating to the written opinion placed on file in rendering judgment. Corbett v. Job, 5 Nev. 201, 205.

As order for judgment.

The decision of a court is, among other things, an order for judgment. It actually determines the judgment to be entered Garr, Scott & Co. v. Spaulding, 51 N. W. 867, 868, 2 N. D. 414.

Order of probate court.

Within the statute providing that appeals shall be allowed from the decision of the probate court to the district court in the following cases, and in all other cases where there shall be a final decision of any matter, the word "decision" is of broader significance than "judgment." It is generic in meaning, and includes rulings of the probate court, whether technically termed "orders" or "judgments"; so that an order of the probate court classifying a demand allowed against the estate of a deceased person is a "decision," and a subsequent order vacating it, and assigning the demand to a different class, is likewise a "decision." Wolfley v. McPherson, 59 Pac. 1054, 1055, 61 Kan. 492.

Ruling on admissibility of evidence.

Rulings of the district court upon matters of law in the exclusion or admission of testimony involving the merits of the case have not been included in the words "decision or intermediate order," within the statute authorizing an appeal from any decision or intermediate order. State v. O'Brien, 43 Pac. 1091, 18 Mont. 1.

DECISION UPON THE MERITS.

A "decision upon the merits" is a decision upon the justice of the case, and not upon technical grounds only. A "nonsuit" is not a judgment, nor the final determination of the cause on the merits, and, under Civ. Code, § 379, specifying the cases in which an action may be dismissed without prejudice, a district court has no authority to order a peremptory nonsuit against the will of the plaintiff. Mulhern v. Union Pac. R. Co., 2 Wyo. 465, 472.

DECKS.

Hay placed in the engine or deck room of a passenger steamer, though the room be inclosed by bulkheads, is upon the "decks or guards" of the steamer, within the meaning of Act July 25, 1866 (14 Stat. 227), prohibiting ignitable commodities from being carried on the decks and guards of passenger steamers, unless protected, etc. Union Ins. Co. v. Shaw (U. S.) 24 Fed. Cas. 580, 582.

DECLARATION.

See "Dying Declarations."

Confession distinguished, see "Confession."

Rev. St. § 5392 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3653], provides that every person who, having taken an oath before a competent tribunal, officer, or person, that he will testify truly, or that any written declaration is true, willfully states or subscribes any material matter which he does not believe to be true, shall be guilty of perjury. Held, that the word "declaration" is not used as a term of art, or in any technical sense, but in its ordinary and popular sense, to signify any statement of material matter of fact sworn to and subscribed by the party charged. United States v. Ambrose, 2 Sup. Ct. 682, 684, 108 U. S. 336, 27 L. Ed. 746.

DECLARATION (In Pleading).

A declaration is an exposition of the plaintiff's original writ, wherein he expresses at large his cause of action or complaint, with the additional circumstances of time and place when and where an injury was committed. Cheetham v. Tillotson (N. Y.) 5 Johns. 430, 434.

"Declaration," as a word of art in the law, is generally used to signify the plea by which plaintiff in the suit at law sets out his cause of action, as the word "complaint" is, in the same sense, the technical name of a bill in chancery. United States v. Ambrose, 2 Sup. Ct. 682, 683, 108 U. S. 336, 27 L. Ed. 746.

The term "declaration" is used to designate the statement of plaintiff's claim which is made in every case tried before the court and jury. The statement is generally presented in several forms, called "counts." Buckingham v. Murray's Ex'r (Del.) 30 Atl. 779, 780, 7 Houst. 176.

"The declaration is a statement in legal form of the plaintiff's cause of action. It consists of five parts: First, the title; second, the venue; third, the commencement; fourth, the statement of the cause of action; fifth, the conclusion." Smith v. Fowle (N. Y.) 12 Wend. 9, 10.

A declaration should contain a statement of all the facts necessary in a point of law to sustain the action, and no more, and these facts should be set forth with certainty. All that is essential in a declaration is an allegation of the facts necessary to give a complete right of action in such a manner that such right necessarily arises therefrom, and in such manner as to be capable of denial or avoidance by plea. Beardsley v. Southmayd, 14 N. J. Law (2 J. S. Green) 534-541.

The term "declaration," as used in the removal statute, providing that any party who desires to remove a cause may file his petition at any time before the defendant is required, by law of the state in which the suit is brought, to answer or plead to the declaration or complaint of the plaintiff, is not used as synonymous with the words "writ" or "summons," which is at common law the process of commencing the suit, and is the first step taken to bring the parties into court, while the declaration or complaint is necessarily the second step, which manifests the cause of action and sets out a narrative of the case, so that such petition need not be filed within the time when pleas for abatement must be filed under the state practice. Wilson v. Winchester & P. R. Co. (U. S.) 82 Fed. 15, 17.

A declaration is a specification, in methodical and legal form, which constitutes the plaintiff's cause of action. 2 Chit. Pl. 240. Under this rule the declaration which charged defendant with so negligently operating a certain electric car running for the carriage of persons for hire that thereby plaintiff, who was then and there a passenger on such car, was, through the negligence of the said defendant as aforesaid, thrown from the car and injured, is insufficient, since the statement of facts admits of almost any proof to sustain it. King v. Wilmington & N. O. Electric Ry. Co. (Del.) 41 Atl. 975, 976, 1 Pennewill, 452.

A declaration is simply the statement of the plaintiff's cause of action, and it has nothing to do with the mode of trial. Strictly, the declaration should contain no averments or statements beyond those that are necessary to set forth the cause of action, and hence a distinct step in the case, relating only to the mode of trial, ought not to be made a part of the declaration, with which it has no concern. Baltimore City Pass. Ry. Co. v. Nugent, 83 Atl. 779, 783, 86 Md. 349, 89 L. R. A. 161.

The province of a declaration is to fully and specifically set out, in a methodical and logical form, the facts which constitute the plaintiff's cause of action, in order that the defendant may be informed of what he is to meet, and also that he may intelligently prepare his defense; but it is not necessary to incorporate into the declaration all matters which may be proved at the trial. Stone v. Pendleton, 43 Atl. 643, 644, 21 R. I. 332.

By Rev. Laws, § 846, a declaration is a part of the writ, so that the writ may be referred to to aid a defective averment in the declaration, and the declaration may be referred to whenever necessary to aid in the identification of the party sued. Moulthrop's Adm'r v. School Dist., 9 Atl. 608, 610, 59 Vt. 381.

The term "declaration" is applicable only to civil procedure. State v. McCann, 67 Me. 372, 374.

Statement distinguished.

A statement is different from a declaration, which is a specification, in legal and technical form, of the circumstances which constitute plaintiff's cause of action. A statement is an immethodical declaration stating in substance the time of the contract, the sum, on what founded, whether a verbal promise, book account, note, bond, penal or single bill, with a certificate of the belief of the plaintiff, or his agent, of what is really due. Dixon v. Sturgeon (Pa.) 6 Serg. & R. 25, 28.

DECLARATION OF DECEASED PERSON.

A report of a physician, since deceased, describing the condition of a person injured in an accident at the time of visiting him for examination, is a "declaration" within St. 1898, c. 535, providing that a declaration of a deceased person shall not be excluded as hearsay if made in good faith before the beginning of the suit, and upon declarant's personal knowledge, though it is in writing, and not by word of mouth. O'Driscoll v. Lynn & B. R. Co., 62 N. E. 3, 180 Mass. 187.

DECLARATION OF DIVIDEND.

A "declaration of dividend" is one of the most important acts of a corporation. It is an assignment pro tanto of its property. It clearly implies corporate action to that effect. It is an action of such a character that it ought to appear upon the books of the company. Dennis v. Joslin Mfg. Co., 36 Atl. 129, 130, 19 R. I. 668, 61 Am. St. Rep. 805.

DECLARATION OF RIGHTS.

Prof. Tiedeman defines the Declaration of Rights to be a "formal declaration enumerating somewhat in detail the rights of the citizen which the state government must respect." McMasters v. West Chester Normal School, 13 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 481, 487.

DECLARATION OF TRUST.

As conveyance, see "Conveyance."

A declaration of trust or use is an act by which a person acknowledges that a property, the title to which he holds, is held by him for the use of another. Griffith v. Maxfield, 51 S. W. 832, 834, 66 Ark. 513.

A declaration of trust is not a grant, and therefore, under a statute requiring that a trust should be created or declared by deed or conveyance, in writing, subscribed by the party creating or declaring the trust, it may appear in the recitative part of the conveyance as well as any other. Wright v. Douglass, 7 N. Y. (3 Seld.) 564, 569.

A declaration of trust as effectually passes the equitable title of the trust fund to the cestui que trust as a gift inter vivos passes the legal title to the donee. Bath Sav. Inst. v. Hathorn, 33 Atl. 836, 837, 88 Me. 122, 32 L. R. A. 377, 51 Am. St. Rep. 382.

DECLARATORY STATUTE.

A "declaratory" statute is one which is expressive of the common law. Gray v. Bennett, 44 Mass. (3 Metc.) 522, 527.

DECLARE.

"Declare," as used in a statute of sales, 2 Rev. St. p. 63, § 40, subd. 4, providing that a testator, at the time of making his subscription to his will, shall declare the instrument so subscribed to be his last will and testament, means "to signify; to make known; to show forth in any manner by words or by acts." Lane v. Lane, 95 N. Y. 494, 498.

The word "declare" signifies to make known, to assert to others; to show forth; "and this in any manner by words or by acts in writing, or by signs." Thus in our English Bible we read: "Declare ye among the heathen, publish, conceal not;" and again the declaration: "By signs or other indications it is said, Ye are manifestly declared to be the epistle of God." Remsen v. Brinckerhoff (N. Y.) 26 Wend. 325, 336, 37 Am. Dec. 251.

As used in the minutes of proceedings relating to the publishing of a will in Germany, stating that the applicant asked leave to deposit his last will in writing, which being granted the applicant declared, "declared" will be held to mean "exhibited" or "published," and not that the testator made an oral will. Koopman v. Carroll, 70 N. W. 395, 50 Neb. 824.

"Acknowledged," when used in an acknowledgment, is not sufficient to meet the requirements of Code, c. 73, § 4, requiring a married woman to acknowledge a conveyance to be her free act, and to "declare" that she had willingly executed the same and does not wish to retract it, since either the acknowledgment or declaration is wanting, as the word "acknowledged" cannot be construed to mean "acknowledged and declared," and the act acknowledged refers to a previous act, and the acknowledgment and declaration cannot be blended. Blair v. Sayre, 2 S. E. 97, 100, 29 W. Va. 604.

As promise.

An oath by a surveyor of highways which recited that he "declared and affirmed," instead of "promised and affirmed," in the form of the statute, was sufficient, since "to declare" that a thing shall be done is equivalent to a promise that such thing will be done. Bassett v. Denn, 17 N. J. Law (2 Har.) 432, 433.

In an application for insurance the applicant declared that he would not practice any pernicious habit that would obviously tend to the shortening of life. Held, that the word "declare" meant "to state; to assert; to utter; to announce some opinion"; and hence the declaration did not amount to a covenant or agreement on the part of the applicant that he would not practice any pernicious habit. Knecht v. Mutual Life Ins. Co., 90 Pa. 118, 121, 35 Am. Rep. 641.

DECLARE THE LAW.

The constitutional provision that the judge may state the evidence and "declare the law" means that he is to charge the law arising upon the evidence so stated by him. He is not to charge every principle of law which may be insisted upon by counsel, whether it have application to the case under consideration or not, how sound soever such principle may be in the abstract. His discussion of legal questions should be confined to such only as are directly raised by the evidence in the case. Conner v. State, 12 Tenn. (4 Yerg.) 137, 141, 26 Am. Dec. 217; Crabtree v. State, 69 Tenn. (1 Lea) 267, 270.

The provision of the Constitution which compels the judge to declare the law, where its language is "shall declare the law," means "shall declare the law applicable to the case then before him." Wagener v. Parrott, 29 S. E. 240, 241, 51 S. C. 489, 64 Am. St. Rep. 695.

DECLINE.

Rev. St. c. 101, § 29, providing that creditors, legatees, or heirs may appeal from the decision of the commissioners appointed by the county to pass upon claims against the estate of a deceased person when the executor or administrator "declines to appeal," does not require that there shall be an expressed demand and refusal by such executor or administrator, but where the executor or administrator has allowed the time limited for appeal to expire without appealing, he has "declined" to appeal within the meaning of the statute. "A neglect to appeal until the right was barred would be declining in the most effectual manner." Groner v. Heid, 22 Wis. 200, 204.

DECOCTION.

According to the dictionaries a "decoction" is an extract prepared by boiling something in water, and an "extract" is anything drawn from a substance by heat solution, dissolution, or chemical process, as essences, tinctures, and the like. In the absence of evidence, the word "decoction" in a tariff act, in reference to duties on decoctions of logwood, is to be understood according to the meaning given by the dictionaries. Sykes v. Magone (U. S.) 38 Fed. 494, 497.

DECORATED CHINA.

The decorated or ornamented porcelain dutiable at 50 per cent. under Rev. St. § 2504, does not apply to paintings on porcelain, which does not in itself constitute an article of china ware, and therefore it is only dutiable under another provision of the act as "paintings not otherwise provided for." Arthur v. Jacoby, 103 U. S. 677, 678, 26 L. Ed. 454.

DECORUM.

The power of a town to enact ordinances for the preservation of good order, decency, and decorum within its limits is sufficient to authorize the town to pass an ordinance prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors therein, the sale of such liquors being prohibited in the rest of the county. Fortner v. Duncan, 15 S. W. 55, 91 Ky. 171, 11 L. R. A. 188.

DECOY.

"Decoy" is the term applied to certain conveniences for decoying and catching wild fowl. Sterling v. Jackson, 37 N. W. 845, 851, 69 Mich. 488, 13 Am. St. Rep. 405.

Force.

The word "decoy" means to entice, tempt, lure, or allure. There can be no such thing as "forcibly decoying" a person from his place of residence. Eberling v. State, 35 N. E. 1023, 1024, 136 Ind. 117.

To "decoy" is to entice, tempt, lure, or allure; and hence to convict one of the charge of kidnapping, under Sess. Laws 1890, § 25, defining the offense of whoever kidnaps, or forcibly or fraudulently carries off or decoys from his place of residence, any person, etc., it is not necessary that the act should be done forcibly, and the injured party may give his consent as to such carrying away and the act still be kidnapping. John v. State, 44 Pac. 51, 53, 6 Wyo. 203 (citing Eberling v. State, 136 Ind. 117, 35 N. E. 1023, 1025.)

As inveigle.

An allegation that defendant was decoyed into a certain county is a statement of fact. The word "decoyed" is synonymous with "inveigled," and in Higgins v. Dewey, 13 N. Y. Supp. 570, "inveigled" is held to mean, in its legal sense, to induce a party to come within the jurisdiction of the court by some scheme, subterfuge, fraud, trick, device, or misrepresentation, that he may be served with process. Campbell v. Hudson, 64 N. W. 483, 484, 106 Mich. 523.

DECOY POND.

A "decoy pond" frequented by ducks is a kind of trade, and of great profit to the owner; and, by the same reason that an action will lie for malicious words spoken by one tradesman to another, it will lie for a malicious act done by one to another, and therefore will lie for depriving the owner of the use and benefit of the pond. Keeble v. Hickeringhall, 3 Salk. 10.

DECREASED CAPACITY.

An instruction, in an action for personal injuries, authorizing the jury to allow as damages the value of plaintiff's time for such period as he was entirely incapacitated for work, and for any "decreased capacity" to earn money in the past, did not authorize a double recovery. The "decreased capacity" could only be construed as applying to that part of the time when he was able to work, but not to his full capacity. Haden v. Sioux City & P. Ry. Co., 60 N. W. 537, 538, 92 Iowa, 226.

DECREE.

See "Consent Decree"; "Definitive Decree"; "Final Decree"; "Foreclosure Decree"; "Interlocutory Decree"; "Joint Decree"; "Judicial Decree"; "Money Decree."

All decrees, see "All."

A decree is the fiat or sentence of law determining the matter in controversy. Blundon v. Crosier, 49 Atl. 1, 2, 93 Md. 355; State v. Ramsburg, 43 Md. 325, 333; Martin v. Evans, 36 Atl. 258, 260, 85 Md. 8, 36 L. R. A. 218, 60 Am. St. Rep. 292. It is a sentence or order of the court pronounced on hearing and understanding all the points in issue, and determining the right of the parties to the suit according to equity and good conscience. Wooster v. Handy (U. S.) 23 Fed. 49, 56; Bissell Carpet-Sweeper Co. v. Goshen Sweeper Co. (U. S.) 72 Fed. 545, 554, 19 C. C. A. 25. Like a judgment at law, it is the sentence pronounced by the court upon the matter of right between the parties, and is founded on the pleadings and proofs in the cause. Rowley v. Van Benthuyzen (N. Y.) 16 Wend. 369, 383 (quoted in Wing v. Warner [Mich.] 2 Doug. 288, 291).

A decree is the judgment of the judge in equitable proceedings upon the facts ascertained, and should be signed by him and be entered in the minutes of the court. Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 4851.

The word "decree" is the proper and usual term to describe the adjudication of a court of equity. Vance's Heirs v. Rockwell, 8 Colo. 240, 243.

"Decree," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 322, rendering a possession of real estate taken under the decree or judgment of a competent court adverse, means a decree or judgment adjudging that a party or his grantor was the owner or seised of some estate in the lands. Packard v. Johnson (Cal.) 4 Pac. 632, 633.

Award of costs and expenses.

Under the Orphans' Code (Revision, § 176) providing that an appeal from an order or "decree" of the orphans' court "respecting the probate" of a will, etc., shall be demanded within 30 days, such order or decree, etc., includes the award of costs and expenses. Holt v. Holt, 5 Atl. 103, 104, 40 N. J. Eq. (13 Stew.) 551.

Confirmation of award.

The term "decree" is comprehensive enough, when not limited in its use in a statute by any definition therein, to include the judicial determination of the rights of the parties in a legal proceeding for the condemnation of private property for use as public streets under the right of eminent domain; hence a confirmation by a court of an award of damages for property taken to widen a street is a decree. Donnelly v. City of Brooklyn, 7 N. Y. Supp. 49.

Decisions and orders included.

The terms "judgment," "decree," "decision," and "order" are more or less cognate, as applied in legal proceedings, and closely allied in meaning, especially under our system of practice, where we do not distinguish between forms of actions at law or suits in chancery. We generally, almost invariably, both bench and bar, express or refer to the judicial determination of the controversy by the word "judgment." The term "order" is not infrequently used in a more restricted sense than the word "judgment." It may be defined to be a command, direction, or decision of the court or judge on some intermediate point or issue in the case, but without finally disposing of the main issue or issues in the cause. Then it is a mere interlocutor, but the term is sometimes given a more extensive signification, even in legal controversies, and is occasionally used as a synonym of "judgment" or "decree." A "judgment" is a final determination of a cause given by any competent tribunal. Judgments, like decrees, are either final or interlocutory, and in the latter sense also include orders. A "judgment" is the decision or sentence of the law, pronounced by a court or other competent tribunal, upon the matter contained in the record. According to the common-law rule, by a "final judgment" is to be understood, not a final determination of the rights of the parties, but merely of the particular suit or controversy depending between them before the court. A "decision" has been defined to be a judgment given by a competent tribunal. This word also includes, in legal parlance, both orders and judgments, as well as the report or account of the opinions or judicial determinations of courts. A "decree" is the judgment or sentence of a court of equity.

It is either interlocutory or final. It embraces, therefore, orders as well as decrees in equity or admiralty. Hence a bond conditioned merely for the performance of the decree or judgment is sufficient, under a statute providing that the appeal bond shall be conditioned that the appellant perform the decision, order, decree, or judgment of the district court, the word "judgment" and the word "decree" both being broad enough to include decision and order. Halbert v. Alford (Tex.) 16 S. W. 814, 815.

The word "decree" on the clerk's docket as follows: "Bill dismissed as to A. and B. Decree"—means that the judge has announced his decision in the case, and therefore an appeal may be taken therefrom at once, though no opinion containing a full statement of the judge's reasons has then been filed. Fairbanks v. Amoskeag Nat. Bank (U. S.) 32 Fed. 572, 573.

As decree in cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction.

As used in 2 Stat. 244, c. 40, authorizing an appeal to the Circuit Court from all final "judgments and decrees" in any of the District Courts of the United States when the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, shall exceed the sum of $50, means "decrees and judgments in cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction only." United States v. Wonson (U. S.) 23 Fed. 745, 747.

As decree of court of record.

In a statute relating to appeals, and requiring proof of service of notice with the notice to be filed with the clerk where the judgment or decree is entered, the terms "judgments" and "decrees" import of themselves judgments and decrees of a court of record. "Judgments," in a general sense, would doubtless include all judgments given in a court of justice, but when the words "judgments or decrees" are used, they can hardly be supposed to include a justice's court judgment. Odell v. Gotfrey, 11 Pac. 190, 192, 13 Or. 466.

Determination in condemnation proceedings.

The term "decree" is sufficiently broad to include a judicial determination of the rights of the parties in legal proceedings for the condemnation of private lands under the right of eminent domain. Donnelly v. City of Brooklyn, 26 N. Y. St. Rep. 27, 28.

As final decree.

A "decree" is final and made at the hearing of the cause. People v. Circuit Court of Cook County, 48 N. E. 717, 722, 169 Ill. 201.

How. & H. St. p. 541, § 50, authorizing a writ of error to any judgment or decree upon proper application, etc., means a final decree. Heckingbottom v. Shell, 11 Miss. (3 Smedes & M.) 588, 590.

The term "decree or judgment," as used in a contract whereby a person agreed to pay an inventor a certain amount as soon as a decree or judgment establishing the validity of said patent shall have been obtained, means a final judgment or decree. Russell v. Lathrop, 122 Mass. 300, 302.

A decree in chancery, like a judgment at law, is the sentence pronounced by the court on the matter of right between the parties, and this sentence is founded on the pleadings and proof in the cause. None of the various orders which are so often made in the progress of the cause for time to answer or produce witnesses, for leave to amend, setting aside a default, or the like, have been, or can, with the least degree of propriety, be called "decrees." Rowley v. Van Benthuysen (N. Y.) 16 Wend. 369, 383.

As used in Gen. St. 1886, c. 56, § 4, providing that after certain payments from a decedent's estate the probate court shall assign the residue of the estate by "a decree," such decree is the final distribution to be made when the estate is fully settled. Wood v. Myrick, 16 Minn. 494, 499 (Gil. 447, 451).

Comp. Laws, § 5099, provides that the court may enforce the performance of any decree by execution, and by section 4745 it may decree trusts against either party, and award execution for the same. Held, that the term "decree" is not applicable to interlocutory orders made in furtherance of suits, but belongs to such adjudications as settle some right or liability pertaining to the substance under controversy. Haines v. Haines, 85 Mich. 138, 145.

A decree which not only enjoins, but also directs, certain acts which defendant shall do, is more in the nature of a final than of a preliminary decree. Appeal of Mammoth Vein Consol. Coal Co., 54 Pa. (4 P. F. Smith) 183, 188.

A decree may be final or interlocutory; but in either case it is an adjudication upon the merits, and not an order in relation to some collateral matter. Rowley v. Van Benthuysen, 16 Wend. 369, 383 (quoted in Wing v. Warner [Mich.] 2 Doug. 288, 291).

As judgment.

The word "decree," when found in the Code of Civil Procedure, shall mean "judgment." Cobbey's Ann. St. Neb. 1903, § 1851.

The word "judgment" is usually applied to a determination of the rights of the parties in an action at law, and the word "decree" to a similar determination in equity; but the words are interchangeable in this Code, each embracing both classes of determination, unless limited expressly or by the context. Shannon's Code Tenn. 1896, § 4698.

The terms "judgment" and "decree," while, strictly speaking, applicable, the former to suits in law and the latter to suits in chancery, are usually employed as convertible terms. Lamson v. Hutchings (U. S.) 118 Fed. 321, 323, 55 C. C. A. 245.

A "decree" is a judgment according to the definition of a judgment contained in Code Prac. § 397. Hughes v. Shreve, 60 Ky. (3 Metc.) 547, 548.

A decree for divorce, with an allowance for alimony or support, is as much a judgment as if it had been obtained in a common-law court. Bennett v. Bennett, 49 Atl. 501, 503, 63 N. J. Eq. 806.

Judgment distinguished.

See, also, "Judgment."

"Decree" is frequently used by the Legislature and courts of the state, and is employed to distinguish a sentence or judgment of the court in the suit in equity, or in respect to the equitable branch of an action or proceeding at law, from a judgment in an action or a branch of the action determined on legal as contradistinguished from equitable principles, the term being employed not as a designation, as something different from a "judgment," but as a judgment of a particular character. McGarrahan v. Maxwell, 28 Cal. 75, 85.

Within the provision of Code 1874, § 1010, that the attorney in an action, suit, or proceeding may be changed at any time before judgment or decree or final determination, the words "action, suit, or proceeding" are referred to distributively in the section. Each has its peculiar meaning, and the words "judgment, decree, and determination" apply equally to each. Thus "judgment" is the final result of action, "decree" of suit, and "determination" of proceeding. Shirley v. Birch, 18 Pac. 344, 345, 16 Or. 1.

Opinion included.

In the case of Durant v. Essex Co., 74 U. S. (7 Wall.) 107, 19 L. Ed. 154, it was said the reason for the signing of a decree "is no part of the judgment itself." The decree, and not the opinion, is the instrument through which the courts act. The opinion of the judge is the expression of the reasons by which he reaches his conclusions, and these may be sustained or contradictory, clear or confused. Where the opinion, after stating that the judge has examined the case on the merits, and that he would dismiss the bill without regard to technicalities, continues: "But it seems to me to be clear that this proceeding could not be sustained at any rate, as, at best, it would be simply a conversion of plaintiff's property, for which she had an ample remedy at law"—such language cannot qualify the decree dismissing the bill, without showing the cause of the dismissal, so as to make it a dismissal for want of jurisdiction. Martin v. Evans, 36 Atl. 258, 260, 85 Md. 8, 36 L. R. A. 218, 60 Am. St. Rep. 292.

Order in probate.

An order directing an executrix to pay a claim against an estate is a "decree," it being a final determination of the rights of the parties to a special proceeding in the Surrogate's Court. In re Bernhard, 1 N. Y. Supp. 225, 226, 48 Hun, 620, 14 Civ. Proc. R. 195.

DECREE OF INSOLVENCY.

A "decree of insolvency" in a court of probate merely ascertains as between the personal representative and the creditors, the status of the estate, and its operation is to transfer to the court of probate exclusive jurisdiction of all claims against the estate, for the whole proceeding is founded on the fact that the assets are insufficient for the payment of the debts to which they are primarily liable. Bush v. Coleman, 25 South. 569, 570, 121 Ala. 548.

DECREE OF NULLITY.

As divorce, see "Divorce."

DECREE OF SALE.

As process, see "Process."

DECREE PRO CONFESSO.

A decree pro confesso is not a decree as of course, according to the prayer of the bill, nor merely such as the complainant chooses to take it; but it is made, or should be made, by the court, according to what is proper to be decreed upon the statement of the bill, assumed to be true. Ohio Cent. R. Co. v. Central Trust Co., 10 Sup. Ct. 235, 237, 133 U. S. 83, 33 L. Ed. 561 (citing Thomson v. Wooster, 114 U. S. 104, 5 Sup. Ct. 788, 29 L. Ed. 105).

DECREEED INSOLVENT.

"Decreed insolvent," as used in Rev. St. c. 76, § 49, authorizing a levy on a decedent's estate, unless prior thereto the estate had been decreed insolvent, means the appointment of commissioners to adjudicate on claims against the estate, as provided for by Rev. St. c. 66, § 3. Walker v. Newton, 27 Atl. 347, 348, 85 Me. 458.

DECREPIT.

"Decrepit," as used in Pen. Code, art. 496, making an assault on such a person an aggravated assault, means a person who is disabled, incapable, or incompetent, from either physical or mental weakness or some defect, whether produced by age or other causes, to such an extent as to render the individual comparatively helpless in a personal conflict with one possessed of ordinary health and strength. It is not necessary that his condition should be due to old age, as is supposed from the definitions given by lexicographers, but any disability sufficient to incapacitate a person is sufficient to render him "decrepit" within the statute. Hall v. State, 16 Tex. App. 6, 11, 49 Am. Rep. 824.

A person who is 50 years of age, and disabled by rheumatism to such an extent that he was compelled to carry his arm in an unnatural position, and in such manner as to render it almost useless to him, is "decrepit." Bowden v. State, 2 Tex. App. 56, 57.

DECRETAL ORDER.

A "decretal order" is such an order as finally determines some right between the parties. Thompson v. McKim (Md.) 6 Har. & J. 302, 319.

A primary order by which no question is determined upon the merits and no rights established is termed a "decretal order," in distinction from an "interlocutory decree," by which something touching the merits is adjudged. Bissell Carpet-Sweeper Co. v. Goshen Sweeper Co. (U. S.) 72 Fed. 545, 554, 19 C. C. A. 25.

DEDI.

Originally the word "dedi" in a feoffment amounted to a warranty of title. Burwell v. Jackson, 9 N. Y. 535, 541.

At the common law a covenant of warranty was implied from the word "dedi." Koch v. Hustis, 87 N. W. 834, 835, 113 Wis. 599.

The words "dedi," "concessi," and "demissi," when used in a conveyance of real estate, at common law imported a covenant in law. Kinney v. Watts (N. Y.) 14 Wend. 38, 40.

The word "dedi" in a deed of land means "to give," and does not imply a covenant against incumbrances, but means a warranty of title. Roebuck v. Duprey, 2 Ala. 535, 538.

"Dedi" means "I have given." It was used in deeds and other instruments of conveyance when such instruments were written in Latin. The term was anciently held to imply a warranty of title. Where, however, the conveyance only purports to pass the right to the grantor to real estate, and not to pass title to the land itself, such term cannot be held to import a warranty. Deakins v. Hollis (Md.) 7 Gill & J. 311, 315; Kent v. Welch (N. Y.) 7 Johns. 258, 259, 5 Am. Dec. 266.

DEDICATION.

See "Actual Dedication"; "Express Dedication"; "Implied Dedication"; "Statutory Dedication"; "Way by Dedication."

A "dedication" is defined to be the act of devoting or giving property for some principal object, in such a manner as to conclude the owner. State v. Otoe County Com'rs, 6 Neb. 129, 133; Village of Mankato v. Willard, 13 Minn. 13, 19 (Gil. 1, 7), 97 Am. Dec. 208; Oswald v. Grenet, 22 Tex. 94, 100. Dedication is the setting apart of land for public use, and an essential requisite to its validity is that it must be of such a character as to conclude the owner. There are two kinds of dedication, viz., statutory and common-law dedication. People v. Marin County, 37 Pac. 203, 204, 103 Cal. 223, 26 L. R. A. 659. Dedication of land for public purposes is simply a devotion of it, or of an easement in it, to such purposes by the owner, manifested by some clear declaration of the fact. Grogan v. Town of Hayward (U. S.) 4 Fed. 161, 163; Bessemer Land & Improvement Co. v. Jenkins, 18 South. 565, 568, 111 Ala. 135, 56 Am. St. Rep. 26; Hunter v. Trustees of Village of Sandy (N. Y.) 6 Hill, 407, 411.

Dedication of a street must arise from some act of the owner of the land, and may be made cum onere. Avis v. Borough of Vine-land, 28 Atl. 1039, 1040, 56 N. J. Law (27 Vroom) 474, 23 L. R. A. 685.

The anomalous doctrine of "dedication" to public use, or, more properly, of a grant to the public without the intervention of a trustee, began as late as 1732, and its growth is still more modern. The first trace of its use was found in Rex v. Hudson, 2 Strange, 909, decided in that year, and the next in Lade v. Shepherd, 2 Strange, 1004, decided three years afterward. It was then suffered to sleep until 1790, when it was awakened by Trustees of Rugby Charity v. Merryweather, 11 East, 375, note. Thereafter, for 30 years, the subject was frequently agitated in regard to grants of highways, and was most prolific in decisions without having its principles definitely settled, but it was thereafter agreed that an owner might dedicate his ground to public use by any act which sufficiently evinced his will, without a previous adverse user by the public, which, however, might be evidence, but not conclusively so, of a grant, and that he might restrict the enjoyment to particular seisins or to particular things and places, etc. Gowen v. Philadelphia Exch. Co. (Pa.) 5 Watts & S. 141, 142, 40 Am. Dec. 489.

Dedication with respect to public highways, etc., is the act of devoting or giving property for some proper object, and in such manner as to conclude the owner. The law which governs such cases is anomalous. Under it rights are parted with and acquired in modes and by means unusual and peculiar. Ordinarily some conveyance or written instrument is required to transmit a right to real property, but the law applicable to dedications is different. A dedication may be made without writing, by act in pais as well as by deed. It is not at all necessary that the owner should part with the title which he has, for dedication has respect to the possession, and not the permanent estate. Its effect is not to deprive a party of title to his land, but to estop him, while the dedication continues in force, from asserting that right of exclusive possession and enjoyment which the owner of property ordinarily has. The principle upon which the estoppel rests is that it would be dishonest, immoral, or indecent, and in some cases even sacrilegious, to reclaim at pleasure property which has been solemnly devoted to the use of the public, or in furtherance of some charitable or pious object. Hunter v. Trustees of Village of Sandy Hill (N. Y.) 6 Hill, 407, 411.

To constitute a dedication of land to public use no particular form or ceremony is necessary. All that is required is the assent of the owner of the land, and the fact of its being used for the public purpose intended by the appropriation. City of Baton Rouge v. Bird, 21 La. Ann. 244, 245.

The manner of making a dedication is immaterial. It may be established by parol. Town of Warren v. Town of Jacksonville, 15 Ill. (5 Peck) 236, 58 Am. Dec. 610; Smith v. Town of Flora, 64 Ill. 93; Kyle v. Town of Logan, 87 Ill. 64; McIntyre v. Storey, 80 Ill. 127; Moffett v. South Park Com'rs, 138 Ill. 620, 28 N. E. 975; Alden Coal Co. v. Chollis (Ill.) 65 N. E. 665, 666.

"In order to constitute a dedication of land for the purpose of a street or alley in a municipal corporation it is not necessary that any statutory course should be pursued. Any act by the owner setting apart to the public a portion of his property, clearly showing that such was his intention, vests the use of the property in the public for the purposes indicated, and, if actually thrown open, the public may take possession. In such case no ordinance or formal evidence of dedication is necessary." Rose v. City of St. Charles, 49 Mo. 509, 510.

The term "dedication," when applied to a street, imports a dedication thereof in its entirety. Borough of South Amboy v. New York & L. B. R. Co., 50 Atl. 368, 369, 66 N. J. Law, 623.

"Dedicated," as used in an instruction, in an action for injuries from a defective highway, that evidence that a certain place had been used as a street by the public for 20 years was evidence from which the jury might infer that it had been located and dedicated to public use as a street, means "appropriated," and not of necessity a dedication by a private proprietor. Commonwealth v. Matthews, 122 Mass. 60, 64.

A common-law dedication—that is, a dedication inferred from acts of the parties—is not usually designated as a "legal dedication." A dedication in such cases arises by reason of estoppel. Sweatman v. Bathrick (S. D.) 95 N. W. 422, 424.

A common-law dedication to public use may be made by grant or other written instrument, by acts or declarations, or by a survey and plat recorded without being acknowledged. Whatever evidences a purpose on the part of the proprietor of land to set off certain parts thereof for the use of the public will be sufficient to evidence an intent to dedicate it to such use. Marah v. Village of Fairbury, 45 N. E. 236, 237, 163 Ill. 401.

The principles upon which the doctrine of dedication rests are peculiar. A dedication does not take place upon the idea that there has been a grant, for it may take place where there is no grantee in being to take at the time of dedication. Beatty v. Kurtz, 27 U. S. (2 Pet.) 566, 7 L. Ed. 521. A dedication is a devotion, to public uses, of the land, or easement in it, by any unequivocal act of the owner of the fee manifesting such clear intention. As no grantee or body politic is necessary to accept the dedication immediately, it follows that it may be a dedication designed by the owner to be accepted by the public in presenti or in futuro. The character and scope of the dedication depend upon the intention of the dedicant expressly manifested or to be gathered from all the circumstances of the case. There is nothing in the nature of the legal act of dedication to prevent its being a dedication in presenti to be accepted and used in futuro. Jersey City v. Morris Canal & Banking Co., 12 N. J. Eq. (1 Beas.) 547, 562.

In Burrill's Law Dictionary the definition given to "dedication" is "Appropriation to a certain use or uses." Ordinarily, it is true, it is limited to a strictly public use, and yet it may have a broader signification, or at least the principle which underlies and supports it may be invoked to support an appropriation to uses not strictly and technically public. Where a county laid out a city, filing a plat on which three lots were marked "Church Lots," and in the dedication written on the plat, and duly acknowledged, the lots were said to be dedicated to church purposes, a resolution of the county appearing on its records, that the lots "be and the same hereby are appropriated as church lots," there was a good appropriation for pious purposes, enforceable at the instance of any church proving its right to be regarded as the personal beneficiary, whether it was a statutory dedication or not. Wyandotte County Com'rs v. First Presbyterian Church, 80 Kan. 620, 637, 1 Pac. 109, 112.

As used in St. 1846, c. 203, limiting the liability of an owner for damages from any defects in any ways opened and dedicated to public use, means a way over land dedicated by the owner thereof to the use of the public as a way, and does not include a way which was taken by a town into its own hands for a public way, and on which it made repairs under the mistaken belief that it had done what was necessary to make it a legal public way. Hayden v. Inhabitants of Attleborough, 73 Mass. (7 Gray) 338, 344.

Abandonment by owner implied.

A dedication implies that the owner abandons the use of the property himself, and gives it over to the public for the purpose designed. As was said in Niagara Falls Suspension Bridge Co. v. Bachman, 66 N. Y. 261, "To constitute a public highway by dedication there must not only be an absolute dedication and setting apart and a surrender to the public use of the land by the proprietors, but there must be an acceptance and a formal opening by the proper authorities, or a user." City of Buffalo v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co., 74 N. Y. Supp. 343, 353, 68 App. Div. 488.

To constitute a dedication there must be an abandonment by the owner to the use of the public exclusively, and not a mere use by the public in connection with a user by the owners in such measure as they may desire. California Nav. & Imp. Co. v. Union Transp. Co., 58 Pac. 936, 939, 126 Cal. 433, 46 L. R. A. 825.

A dedication to the public of the use of land must rest on the intention or clear assent of the owner, which may be manifested by writing, sealed or unsealed, or by parol, or by acts inconsistent or irreconcilable with any inference except such consent. But the dedication must be under such circumstances as to indicate an abandonment of the use to the grantee by the owner, and the acts and declarations, to effect a dedication, must be unambiguous and unequivocal. Patterson v. People's Natural Gas Co., 33 Atl. 575, 172 Pa. 554 (citing Dovaston v. Payne, 2 Smith's Lead. Cas. 142, 155).

As an appropriation for a charitable use.

"In the case of Benn v. Hatcher, 81 Va. 25, 59 Am. Rep. 645, it was held that a dedication of land for a cemetery was valid, and it was said that, in its technical legal sense, dedication is an appropriation of land for a public use, as for a highway, a common, or the like, and may be effectual, it seems, when made to a pious or charitable use, though not distinctly a public one." In Hunter v. Trustees of Village of Sandy Hill (N. Y.) 6 Hill, 407, 411, it is said, "Land may be dedicated to pious and charitable purposes as well as for public ways, commons, and other easements in the nature of ways, so as to conclude the owner who makes the dedication." At common law a dedication did not convey a fee, but it was held in trust by the owner, but now, by virtue of statute, the fee passes by a dedication. Patrick v. Young Men's Christian Ass'n of Kalamazoo, 79 N. W. 208, 210, 120 Mich. 185.

As an appropriation for a public use.

Dedication is the appropriation of land by the owner to some public use. Venable v. Wabash Western Ry. Co., 20 S. W. 493, 498, 112 Mo. 103, 18 L. R. A. 68; Rees v. City of Chicago, 38 Ill. 822, 835; Barteau v. West, 23 Wis. 416, 420.

"'Dedication' means an appropriation by the owner of his land for public uses. The public does not take the land when it is 'dedicated,' within the meaning of that word—that is, does not deprive a person by some legal proceeding of his property—for the obvious reason that the property is given or devoted by the owner himself for public use or enjoyment." Barteau v. West, 23 Wis. 416, 420.

According to its strict significance, a dedication involves only the devotion by a private person of his property to a definite public use. It is a devotion by a private person of his own property to public uses inconsistent with the exercise thereafter by the owner of a personal dominion over the same; and, where property was claimed to have been dedicated to public authorities for public usage generally, the mere appropriation by the public authorities of this public property to an indefinite public use is no such irrevocable abdication by the public authorities of all their power and control over the same as will prevent the subsequent appropriation of the same property to such other public uses as the interests of the public may thereafter require. Pettitt v. City of Macon, 23 S. E. 198, 200, 95 Ga. 645.

The term "dedication" is used generally in relation only to such rights as may be acquired in this manner by the public, and not private rights. Toyaho Creek Irrigation Co. v. Hutchins, 52 S. W. 101, 105, 21 Tex. Civ. App. 274.

Dedication is "the deliberate appropriation of land by its owner for any general and public usage, reserving to himself no other rights in the soil than such as are perfectly compatible with the full exercise and enjoyment of the public uses to which he has devoted his property." A public landing on the bank of a river to enable passengers and freight to be taken from steamboats to the shore may be the subject of dedication. Gardiner v. Tisdale, 2 Wis. 153, 187, 60 Am. Dec. 407.

There can be no common-law dedication to a railway company, which is but a private corporation, though engaged in a public service. Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Whitham, 40 N. E. 1014, 1018, 155 Ill. 514, 28 L. R. A. 612, 46 Am. St. Rep. 355.

"Dedication is an appropriation to a certain use or uses. Ordinarily it is limited to a strictly public sense, and yet it may have a broader signification; or, at least, the principle which underlies and supports it may be invoked to support an appropriation to uses not strictly and technically public." Wyandotte County Com'rs v. Presbyterian Church, 1 Pac. 109, 112, 30 Kan. 620.

Dedication is a matter purely between the owner and the public. There is no such thing as a dedication between the owner and individuals. The public must be a party to every dedication, and though some of the cases say that platting a tract of land, recording the plat, and selling lots by reference to such plats, constitute a dedication of the streets in favor of the purchasers of these lots, even though a dedication to the public is not perfected and completed, such statement is not absolutely correct as a legal principle. Prescott v. Edwards, 49 Pac. 178, 117 Cal. 298, 59 Am. St. Rep. 186.

Dedication is the appropriation to public uses of some right of property, as dedication of a highway, landing, square, park, land for school purposes, etc. The act of giving or devoting property to some public use, an appropriation of realty by the owner to the use of the public, and the adoption thereof by the public, as the dedication of soil for a highway, has respect to the possession of the land, not to the permanent estate—express when explicitly made by ordinary declaration, deed, or vote; implied when there is acquiescence in the public use. A public square in a town or village, which for more than 80 years has been treated as such by the county court of the county, has been recognized as such by the municipal authorities of the town, and used as a public square by the court and the public generally, must be considered as dedicated as a public square for the use of the public. Sturmer v. Randolph County Court, 26 S. E. 532, 534, 42 W. Va. 724, 36 L. R. A. 300.

Condemnation distinguished.

See "Condemn—Condemnation."

As either express or implied.

A dedication of land for the public highway may be either expressed, as where the owner manifests his purpose by grant evidenced in writing, or implied, when the acts and conduct of the owner clearly manifests the intention on his part to devote land to the public use; but in either case it is always a question of intention, and no particular formality or form of words is necessary. Schettler v. Lynch, 64 Pac. 955, 23 Utah, 305.

Common-law dedications are divided into two classes, express and implied. In both it is necessary and essential that there should be a surrender or an appropriation of the land by the owner to the public use. The former, or express, dedication is evidenced and shown by some explicit or positive declaration.

ration or manifestation of intention to surrender the land, and the latter, or implied, dedication, by some act or course of conduct on the part of the owner from which a reasonable inference of intent may be drawn. A showing of intent to dedicate is indispensable, and without it, express or implied, there can be no valid dedication. Hurley v. City of West St. Paul, 86 N. W. 427, 430, 83 Minn. 401.

Common-law dedications are, for convenience of description, frequently subdivided into two classes—express dedications and implied dedications. The substantial difference between the two consists in the mode of proof. In the former case the intention to appropriate the land to public use is manifested by some outward act of the owner, manifesting his purpose, while in the latter it is usually by such acts or conduct not directly manifesting the intention, but from which the law will imply the intention. Evidence that the owner of land petitions the county supervisors to declare a road over his land a highway; that the board did so, though without following the statutory requirements; and that the road was so used and worked by the public for 25 years—shows a dedication. People v. Marin County, 37 Pac. 203, 204, 103 Cal. 223, 26 L. R. A. 659.

Common-law dedications are of two classes, express and implied. In both it is necessary that there should be an appropriation of the land by the owner to public use—in the one case by some express manifestation of his purpose to devote the land to the public use; in the other, some act or course of conduct from which the law would imply such an intent. City of San Antonio v. Sullivan, 57 S. W. 42, 43, 23 Tex. Civ. App. 619.

A dedication may be either express or implied. If the owner of land sets it apart for the use of the public, and declares that such is his intention, or where he conveys it to a municipality, or to a trustee, to hold for the use of the public, the dedication is express. An implied dedication arises by operation of law from the acts of the owner, and is founded on the principle of estoppel in pais. It does not assume a grant, but that the owner, by his conduct, or his acquiescence in the use of the public of the land for the specified purpose, until it would be greatly injured or inconvenienced by a deprivation of the use, is estopped from interfering or preventing the public from continuing the use. City of Athens v. Burkett (Tenn.) 59 S. W. 404, 407.

Gift distinguished.

A dedication, while involving the essential features of a gift, and inuring to the benefit of the public as a grant, differs from the grant in that no grantee in esse is necessary to its validity. City of Athens v. Burkett (Tenn.) 59 S. W. 404, 407.

As requiring both intention to dedicate and acceptance.

To constitute a valid and complete dedication, two things must concur, to wit, an intention by the owner, clearly indicated by his words or acts, to dedicate the land to public use, and an acceptance by the public of the dedication. City of San Francisco v. Canavan, 42 Cal. 541, 554; Demartini v. City and County of San Francisco, 40 Pac. 496, 498, 107 Cal. 402; People v. Dreher, 35 Pac. 867, 868, 101 Cal. 271; People v. Blake, 60 Cal. 497, 503; City of Los Angeles v. Kysor, 58 Pac. 90, 91, 125 Cal. 463; In re Board of Street Opening & Improvement of City of New York, 67 N. Y. Supp. 57, 59, 54 App. Div. 479; Alton v. Meenwenberg, 66 N. W. 571, 573, 108 Mich. 629; Irving v. Ford, 32 N. W. 601, 604, 65 Mich. 241; Elyton Land Co. v. South & North Alabama R. Co., 10 South. 270, 271, 95 Ala. 631; New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. v. Fair Haven & W. R. Co., 40 Atl. 607, 610, 70 Conn. 610; Town of Kent v. Pratt, 48 Atl. 418, 420, 73 Conn. 573; Ayers v. State, 26 S. W. 19, 59 Ark. 26; City of Seattle v. Hill, 62 Pac. 446, 448, 23 Wash. 92; Lightcap v. Town of North Judson, 55 N. E. 952, 154 Ind. 43 (citing City of Columbus v. Dahn, 36 Ind. 330, 333); Rees v. City of Chicago, 33 Ill. 322; Smith v. Town of Flora, 64 Ill. 93; Hiner v. Jeanpert, 65 Ill. 428; Wragg v. Penn Tp., 94 Ill. 11, 34 Am. Rep. 199; Town of Lake View v. Le Bahn, 120 Ill. 92, 9 N. E. 269; Fairbury Union Agricultural Board v. Holly, 169 Ill. 9, 48 N. E. 149; Woodburn v. Town of Sterling, 184 Ill. 208, 56 N. E. 378; Alden Coal Co. v. Challis (Ill.) 65 N. E. 665, 666; Moffett v. South Park Com'rs, 138 Ill. 620, 623, 28 N. E. 975.

In order to establish a street by common-law dedication, it takes two to make the bargain—the owner of the land to dedicate or give, and the public to accept. The owner's intent is a vital, and usually the most vital, question in the case, and is thus distinguished from the acquisition of a highway by the provision of a statute making a street a public highway where it has been used, worked, and repaired as a public highway for more than six years. One is a voluntary grant—an acceptance in pais—while the other is merely a species of statutory limitation. Village of Benson v. St. Paul, M. & M. Ry. Co., 64 N. W. 393, 394, 62 Minn. 198.

Dedication is a gift of land by the owner for a way, and an acceptance of the gift by the public, either by some express act of acceptance, or by strong implication arising from obvious convenience or frequent and long-continued use, repairing, lighting, or other significant acts of persons competent to act for the public in that behalf. Hemphill v. City of Boston, 62 Mass. (8 Cush.) 195, 196, 54 Am. Dec. 749.

Dedication, as applied to land, is an appropriation of the land to public uses, made by the owner of the fee and accepted for such use by or on behalf of the public. The vital principle is the animus dedicandi. Time, though often a material ingredient of a dedication, is not indispensable, for, if the act of dedication be unequivocal, it may take place immediately. Ward v. Farwell, 6 Colo. 66, 69.

The vital principle of dedication is the intention to dedicate, and, whenever this is unequivocally manifested, the dedication, so far as the owner of the soil is concerned, has been made. If accepted and used by the public in the manner intended, the dedication is complete, precluding the owner and all claiming in his right from asserting any ownership inconsistent with such use. Niles v. City of Los Angeles, 58 Pac. 190, 192, 125 Cal. 572; Hibberd v. Melville (Cal.) 33 Pac. 201, 202; Smith v. City of San Luis Obispo, 30 Pac. 591, 592, 95 Cal. 463 (citing Harding v. Jasper, 14 Cal. 642, 648); Quinn v. Anderson, 11 Pac. 746, 70 Cal. 454.

In order to constitute a dedication it is not essential that the intention be evidenced by words, either written or spoken. If the acts of the party indicate an intention to dedicate the land to the public use it is sufficient, and if the dedication is accepted by the public, as by use and travel, it is complete. Wragg v. Penn Tp., 94 Ill. 11, 25, 34 Am. Rep. 199 (quoted in Alden Coal Co. v. Chellis [Ill.] 65 N. E. 665, 666).

The owner of land cannot, by merely making a plat of it and designating streets thereon, force the public authorities to assume control over it as a highway; in other words, a mere dedication is not of itself sufficient to establish a highway which the local authorities are bound to deal with as a thoroughfare. City of Baltimore v. Broumel, 37 Atl. 648, 649, 86 Md. 153.

Dedication is the joint effect of an offer by the owner to dedicate land, and an acceptance of such offer by the public. Only two parties are necessary to a dedication—the owner upon the one side, and the public upon the other. There can be no dedication without the participation of both, and no dedication can be stronger or more binding by the participation or intervention of others. The offer of the owner to dedicate may be manifested in a hundred different ways, and the acceptance of the offer by the public may be manifested in a like number of ways. City of Los Angeles v. Kysor, 125 Cal. 463, 466, 58 Pac. 90, 91. Where the owner of land in a city offered to dedicate the same, but the city did nothing for 20 years to show an acceptance, when it commenced suit to establish title to the land, no dedication took place. City of Anaheim v. Langenberger, 66 Pac. 855, 856, 134 Cal. 608.

A common-law dedication is a continuous, irrevocable offer to dedicate, which the dedi-cator cannot retract, but which does not become a street until the properly constituted authorities do some acts showing acceptance thereof. Downend v. Kansas City, 56 S. W. 902, 904, 156 Mo. 60, 51 L. R. A. 170.

To constitute a valid dedication of land to the public there must be a clear intention on the part of the owner to dedicate, which may be established in various modes, some of which are provided by statute, and others by such acts or declarations in pais as are satisfactory evidence of such design; and there must be acceptance of such dedication by the public, either by the user for a length of time, more or less according to circumstances, or by its adoption by the public authorities. Bauman v. Boeckeler, 24 S. W. 207, 210, 119 Mo. 189.

"Dedication to the public is a question of intention, and the owner is not concluded until his purpose to surrender the land to public use is clearly manifested." H. B. Anthony Shoe Co. v. West Jersey Ry. Co., 42 Atl. 279, 57 N. J. Eq. 607; Mark v. Village of West Troy, 27 N. Y. Supp. 543, 544, 76 Hun, 162.

A fair definition of what constitutes dedication is found in 1 Bouv. Law Dict. (15th Ed.) 492, as follows: "An appropriation of land to some public use made by the owner, and accepted for such use by or on behalf of the public. Without acceptance a dedication is incomplete." The rule seems to be abundantly supported by authority in this and other states that the owners of land must have an intention to dedicate, coupled with an actual abandonment of the use of the property exclusively to the public. And the rule is equally well settled that such dedication must be accepted by the public. Close v. Swanson, 89 N. W. 1043, 1045, 64 Neb. 389.

Two things are necessary to constitute a dedication, at common law, of private property to public use: First, there must be a plain and unequivocal intention on the part of the public to appropriate the property to public use; secondly, there must be an acceptance, by user or otherwise, on the part of the public. State v. Hamilton, 70 S. W. 619, 621, 109 Tenn. 276 (citing Scott v. Cheatham, 59 Tenn. [12 Heisk.] 713, 719; Mathis v. Parham, 1 Tenn. Ch. 533).

To constitute a valid dedication there must have been an actual intention on the part of the owner or owners, clearly indicated by unequivocal acts or conduct, to dedicate the land to the public for use as an alley, and there must have been an acceptance by the public of the land dedicated. Mere evidentiary facts, such as permitting the public to pass over land with the owner's permission, while he uses the land for his own purposes, or until he chooses to devote it to other uses, do not constitute, of themselves, dedication.

Shellhouse v. State, 110 Ind. 509, 518, 11 N. E. 484, 486.

Dedication is a pure question of fact. The intention of the owner to dedicate is a vital element in every case, and that intention also is a pure question of fact. A mere permissive user by the owner of the land for a highway never can amount to a dedication, as that is a user by license, and nothing more, and of itself will never ripen into a dedication, no matter how long continued. Hartley v. Vermillion (Cal.) 70 Pac. 278.

The doctrine of dedication rests upon the principle of the common law that, whenever a person has made representations or pursued a line of conduct with a view to lead others to adopt a particular course of action, they shall be binding against him. Its vital principle is the intent to dedicate, and, whenever that is manifested, the dedication is complete. The length of time necessary to raise a presumption of dedication from user must depend upon circumstances of each particular case, but where the only evidence of dedication is user by the public, unaccompanied by any circumstances or act indicating an intention to dedicate, or where the public or individuals have not acted upon the acquiescence in such a way that its retraction would materially affect the public accommodation and private rights, and thus evince bad faith in the owner, the weight of authority is that such user must be for 20 years, to establish the public right. Wood v. Hurd, 34 N. J. Law (5 Vroom) 87, 88.

Ordinarily the dedication of a highway is by statutory proceedings, showing both the dedication and the acceptance. A dedication sometimes imposes burdens upon the public as well as grants privileges. Riley v. Buchanan, 76 S. W. 527, 528, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 803, 63 L. R. A. 642.

An acceptance may be shown by user by the public, as by travel, or by the acts of the public officers in repairing and keeping up the streets. Town of Lake View v. Le Bahn, 120 Ill. 92, 102, 9 N. E. 269, 273 (quoted in Alden Coal Co. v. Challis [Ill.] 65 N. E. 665, 666).

Where a road is outside of a municipal corporation, no particular acts are required by the law to constitute an acceptance. Where it is traveled, recognized, and worked upon as a highway, a presumption of acceptance arises, and, where no repairs are needed, use by the public sufficiently long and general to evidence an acceptance will be sufficient. Fairbury Union Agriculture Board v. Holly, 169 Ill. 9, 15, 48 N. E. 149, 151 (quoted in Alden Coal Co. v. Challis [Ill.] 65 N. E. 665, 666).

As manifested by deed.

A dedication of property to public use as a street, by a deed recognizing the street, must contain the following elements: (1) A street designated on a plat made or adopted by the party himself as passing over his lands; (2) a subsequent conveyance of all lots bounding on such street; and (3) the retention, at the time of the conveyance by the owner, of the fee in the bed of the street. Therefore, where a grantor of lands conveyed to the grantee the fee to the middle of a certain street designated in the deed, no dedication of the street to the public arose by implication from such deed. City of Baltimore v. Northern Cent. Ry. Co., 41 Atl. 911, 913, 88 Md. 427.

Dedication of land to public use as a highway may be inferred from the execution of conveyances referring to and adopting a map whereon such highway is delineated. Vanatta v. Jones, 42 N. J. Law (13 Vroom) 561, 563.

As manifested by making or filing of map or plat.

A dedication of a right of way to the public is not shown by the recording of a plat of land with a roadway, and the selling of lots in accordance therewith, although it may create, by implication, a contract of the purchasers that the roadway will remain for their benefit. Fulton v. Town of Dover (Del.) 31 Atl. 974, 975, 8 Houst. 78.

As to streets, parks, and public places, the filing of a map on which they are named as such, or their character plainly indicated, and the making of conveyances by reference to such map, will operate conclusively as a dedication. Palen v. Ocean City, 46 Atl. 774, 775, 64 N. J. Law, 669.

Dedication implies an intent upon the part of the dedicator to grant to the public an easement, and it may be manifested by a writing, map, or other unmistakable evidence of purpose; and to give validity to the dedication it must be accepted by formal act or implied from user. Where the owner of land made and filed a map showing lots, streets, public squares, etc., and sold by reference to the map, it will be presumed that he intended to dedicate to the public the streets, etc., appearing thereon. City of Buffalo v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co., 39 N. Y. Supp. 4, 10.

Where the owner of land makes a plat laying it out into lots or blocks with streets clearly shown thereon, and conveys lots with reference to such plat, it constitutes a complete dedication, and the streets cannot be closed up or obstructed. Price v. Stratton (Fla.) 33 South. 644, 647 (citing Porter v. Carpenter, 39 Fla. 14, 21 South. 788).

Where the owner of land lays out and establishes a town, exhibits a map of the streets and public square, and sells the lots with reference to the map, the purchasers acquire, as appurtenant to their lots, the rights, privileges, easements, and servitudes represented by such map. Lamor County v. Clements, 49 Tex. 347, 355.

A dedication may be made by grant or other written instrument, or it may be evidenced by acts and declarations without writing. No particular form is necessary to the validity of a dedication. It is purely a question of intention. A dedication may be made by a survey and plat alone, without any declaration, either oral or on the plat, when it is evident that it was the intention of the proprietor to set apart certain grounds for the use of the public. Guttery v. Glenn, 66 N. E. 305, 309, 201 Ill. 275 (citing Maywood Co. v. Village of Maywood, 118 Ill. 61, 6 N. E. 866; City of Jacksonville v. Jacksonville Ry. Co., 67 Ill. 540).

A dedication is a mode of conveyance. To constitute a common-law dedication of land to public purposes by means of a plat, the same certainty of description is required as in other forms of conveyance, and the mere coloring, on a plat drawn to a scale of 400 feet to the inch, of a portion along one side of a strip marked as being 80 feet in width, to indicate that the colored portion was to be devoted to park purposes, is not sufficient to constitute a dedication which will defeat a subsequent conveyance of the entire strip, where the coloring was not of uniform width, and there was nothing marked, either upon the plat or on the ground, by which the width of the intended park portion could be determined with certainty. Sanders v. Village of Riverside (U. S.) 118 Fed. 720, 724, 55 C. C. A. 240.

Parol dedication.

Dedication is not within the statute of frauds, and need not be by deed or other writing, but may be effectually done by verbal declaration. City of Winchester v. Carroll, 40 S. E. 37, 38, 99 Va. 727; Harding v. Jasper, 14 Cal. 642, 648.

There is no particular form of making a dedication. It may be done in writing or by parol, or it may be inferred from the owner's acts, or implied in certain cases from long use. A grant is not necessary to create it, and in this consists its main difference from a license to individuals. City of Macon v. Franklin, 12 Ga. 239, 244.

A parol dedication is good, and is generally the only one made; and, though there is no grantee to take, it vests in the public, and is different from ordinary grants, and is to be construed on principles to meet the nature of the case. Curtis v. Keesler (N. Y.) 14 Barb. 511, 521.

To dedicate property to public use is simply to appropriate or set it apart to such use. There must be not only an intention to dedicate, but an act manifesting such an intention. No particular form or solemnity, however, is required to constitute a valid dedication. It need not be by writing duly signed and acknowledged, but may be by parol. It is not necessary even that there should be any grantee named or any consideration expressed. Under some circumstances it may be presumed without proof of any act of dedication, from the acquiescence of the owner in the use and occupation of the property by the public. But usually such use and occupation must be adverse to the title of the owner to raise a presumption of dedication. Nor is it necessary that the owner should divest himself of the fee, but a grant of the use and occupancy of real estate, without any restriction as to duration of the writ, is a good dedication, though the fee remains in the grantor. But verbal declarations by an owner that he had surrendered the control of a river landing or beach to the municipal authorities of a town temporarily, and because he was having trouble with those to whom he had leased it, did not import a legal dedication to the public; neither would the consent of such owner to the construction of a road for his own and the public use make out a valid dedication; and where, under the circumstances, the use of such road by the public in common with himself was but a license, such use of the road for any length of time would not deprive the owner of his title and right to the property. Robertson v. Wellsville (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 954, 955.

Ordinarily some conveyance or written instrument is required to transmit a right to real property, but the law applicable to dedication is different. A dedication may be made without writing, by act in pais as well as by deed. It is not at all necessary that the owner should part with the title which he has, for dedication has respect to the possession, and not to the permanent estate. Its effect is not to deprive a party of title to his land, but to estop him, while the dedication continues in force, from asserting that right of exclusive possession and enjoyment which the owner of property ordinarily has. Village of Mankato v. Willard, 13 Minn. 13, 19 (Gil. 1, 7), 97 Am. Dec. 208.

A dedication may be made without writing. It may be made by acts from which the intention to dedicate may be rightfully presumed, and with which any other presumption would be inconsistent. McIntyre v. El Paso County Com'rs, 61 Pac. 237, 240, 15 Colo. App. 78.

Prescription distinguished.

"The distinction between 'dedication' and 'prescription' is this: The first is established by proof of an act of dedication and of the animus dedicandi, without reference to the period of use; in the second, long user is an essential ingredient." State v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co., 45 Iowa, 139, 142.

As presumed from acts of owner.

A dedication of land to public use is a setting apart of such land to such use. It need not be by deed, nor need it be evidenced by the use of it having been continued for any particular time. It is enough that there has been some clear, unequivocal act or declaration of the proprietor evidencing an intention to set it apart for a public use, and that others have acted in reference to and on the faith of such manifestation of intention. If the act of dedication be unequivocal, it may take place immediately. If there be no such act, it may be evidenced by an uninterrupted use, and need not be for any particular time. However, the owner may, without any intention of dedication, permit the public for any length of time to use a way, and this would not constitute a dedication, but a license which might be revoked at pleasure by the owner. Ramthun v. Halfman, 58 Tex. 551, 553.

"A dedication is not an act of omission to assert a right, but it is the affirmative act of the donor, resulting from an active, and not a passive, condition of the owner's mind on the subject. A mere nonassertion of a right does not establish a dedication, unless circumstances establish the purpose or intention to donate the use to the public." City of Chicago v. Borden, 60 N. E. 915, 919, 190 Ill. 430 (quoting City of Chicago v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co., 152 Ill. 561, 38 N. E. 768); City of Chicago v. Hill, 17 N. E. 46, 49, 124 Ill. 646 (citing Grube v. Nichols, 36 Ill. 92). See, also, Georgia R. & Banking Co. v. City of Atlanta, 45 S. E. 256, 257, 118 Ga. 486.

Dedication is the setting apart of land for the public use. To constitute a valid dedication to a public use it is essential that the acts of the owner be of such a character as to conclude him, and that as against the public it be accepted by the public local authorities or by general public user. Where a landowner had divided a tract of land into lots and blocks with streets thereon, and one of such streets was afterwards sewered and paved, and a street railway placed thereon, without objection, there was a dedication of the street. Spaulding v. Wesson (Cal.) 45 Pac. 807.

As presumed from user.

A dedication may be done verbally or by writing, by a single act or a series of acts, if clear and unequivocal, as indicating the owner's intention. But a presumption of dedication will not follow from mere user, without more, for any period short of 20 years. Bessemer Land & Improvement Co. v. Jenkins, 18 South. 565, 568, 111 Ala. 135, 56 Am. St. Rep. 26.

No specified length of possession is necessary to constitute a valid dedication. All that is required is the assent of the owner of the soil to the public use, and the actual enjoyment by the public of the use, for such a length of time that the public accommodation and private rights would be materially affected by a denial or interruption of the enjoyment. Ross v. Thompson, 78 Ind. 90, 95.

Uninterrupted and continuous use acquiesced in for several years constitutes conclusive proof of dedication. Village of Pewaukee v. Savoy, 79 N. W. 436, 438, 103 Wis. 271, 50 L. R. A. 836, 74 Am. St. Rep. 859.

The user by the public must be in such a way and at such a time as that the public accommodation and private rights will be materially affected by the interruption of the enjoyment. Woodburn v. Town of Sterling, 184 Ill. 208, 215, 56 N. E. 378, 381 (quoted in Alden Coal Co. v. Challis [Ill.] 65 N. E. 665, 666).

Where the intent of the owner to dedicate is clearly shown aliunde, acceptance may be established by user for a period less than that prescribed by the statute of limitations. Bauman v. Boeckeler, 24 S. W. 207, 210, 119 Mo. 189.

Dedication must be made by the owner of the land, and exists only when he has manifested some intention to make the dedication. Where a dedication of a highway is sought to be established by a user, it must appear that such user was with the knowledge of the owner and with his consent, or without objection on his part. Hope v. Barnett, 20 Pac. 245, 247, 78 Cal. 9; Huffman v. Hall, 36 Pac. 417, 418, 102 Cal. 26; Demartini v. City and County of San Francisco, 40 Pac. 496, 498, 107 Cal. 402.

"When ground is dedicated to the public and accepted by them, it then becomes a highway, and acceptance may be shown by user by the public, as by travel, or by the acts of the public officers in repairing and keeping it up." Rees v. City of Chicago, 38 Ill. 322 (quoted in Alden Coal Co. v. Challis [Ill.] 65 N. E. 665, 666).

No express act of dedication is necessary, and consent may be implied from acquiescence and user by the public, and the user does not depend upon any fixed period of time. Hiner v. Jeanpert, 65 Ill. 428 (quoted in Alden Coal Co. v. Challis [Ill.] 65 N. E. 665, 666).

A dedication of land to the public may be, and often is, without deed. All that seems necessary is that the owner shall clearly manifest an intention to dedicate the land to public use, and that the public should, relying on that manifestation, have entered into the use and occupation of it in such a manner as renders it injurious and unjust to reclaim it. Where public squares and highways are laid out by the original owners of city and village sites, and building lots have been sold and built upon, bounded upon these public squares, with a just understanding on the part of the purchasers that the land is permanently devoted to public use, the dedication has become irrevocable. And even where the particular use has ceased, the public still has a right which cannot be disregarded. No particular length of time during which usage by the public continues is necessary in order to effect a dedication, and such time only is requisite as suffices to establish that interest in the public, with the assent and concurrence of the owner, which would render it fraudulent in him to resume his rights. Fifteen years has generally been considered as prima facie sufficient; but enjoyment for a much less period, with other circumstances, may perfect the right. Thus, where a deed was issued to A. and B. for the use of a county for the purpose of a courthouse, with the power to convey to the county, no conveyance by them was necessary to give the public an interest in the land; but if the land was laid out as a public square, and the public acquired an interest in it as such, it was dedicated to public use, and cannot be reclaimed, even if the use of the courthouse be discontinued. But where a part of such land was never used by the public, but was occupied by the owner for private use, such occupancy was evidence that the public claim was waived. State v. Trask, 6 Vt. 355, 365, 27 Am. Dec. 554.

Adverse use of land by the public for 30 years establishes the presumption of a dedication. Schwerdtle v. Placer County, 41 Pac. 448, 449, 108 Cal. 589.

Property used as a public street by the public from the earliest recollection of the oldest inhabitants, and known for years in the city plan as "Main Street," on which houses fronted and were numbered, and water mains had been laid and electric wires strung, and which had been guttered, lighted, and cleansed at public expense, and paved at the general expense of the property holders and the city, and a portion of its sidewalk paved by the property holders and the city, will be deemed a public street, as a dedication and acceptance may be presumed from long-continued user. City of Winchester v. Carroll, 40 S. E. 37, 38, 99 Va. 727.

Dedication must originate in the voluntary donation by the owner of the land, and be completed by the acceptance of the public. To support a dedication there must be such user, and so accompanied by corroborating circumstances, as to clearly demonstrate both. The doctrine of dedication could not be applied to flats adjoining upland and bounded by salt water. The fact that such flats were occasionally used by the public did not constitute proof of a dedication. Green v. Inhabitants of Chelsea, 41 Mass. (24 Pick.) 71, 80.

As passing title.

A dedication may be made without writing by act in pais as well as by deed. It is not at all necessary that the owner should part with the title which he has, for dedication has respect to the possession, and not the permanent estate. Its effect is not to deprive a party of the title to his land, but to estop him, while the dedication continues in force, from asserting that right of exclusive possession and enjoyment which the owner of property ordinarily has. Hunter v. Trustees of Village of Sandy Hill (N. Y.) 6 Hill, 407, 411.

Of invention.

An inventor is not to be considered as having dedicated his invention to the public by licensing a few persons to use his invention to ascertain its utility, or by any such acts of peculiar indulgence and use as may fairly consist with the clear intention to hold the exclusive privilege. But if the inventor proclaims his invention to all the world, and suffers it to go into general and public use, without objection; if he asserts no exclusive right for years, with a full knowledge that the public are led by it to a general use, such conduct amounts to strong proof that he waives the exclusive right, and dedicates the invention to the world. After such conduct the attempt to regain the exclusive right and secure it by patent would operate as a fraud upon the public; and would hold out inducements to incur heavy expenses in putting inventions into operation, of which the party might be deprived at the mere will or caprice of the inventor. Mellus v. Silsbee (U. S.) 16 Fed. Cas. 1332, 1334.

"Dedication," as applied to a patent, means the surrender of the invention to the public by the inventor. It may be presumed from the inventor's long acquiescence in the use of the invention by the public without attempting to restrain the same. An invention may also be said to be dedicated to the public where the public have been permitted to use it for some time before the inventor applies for a patent thereon. While acquiescence of an inventor in the public use of his invention can in no case be presumed where he has no knowledge of such use, such knowledge may nevertheless be presumed from the circumstances of the case, and if the inventor does not, immediately after notice, assert his right, it is such evidence of acquiescence in the public use as will forever afterwards prevent him from asserting it; but, if his right is perfected by a patent, no presumption arises against it from a subsequent use of it by the public. Shaw v. Cooper, 32 U. S. (7 Pet.) 292, 8 L. Ed. 689.

Of literary production.

Lord Mansfield and some others, distinguished for their great learning and ability, have considered the publication of a work not as such a dedication of it to the public by the author at common law as to deprive him of the exclusive right to republish it. With the greatest respect for these opinions, we think there is a difference in principle between the right to republish a printed work and the exclusive right of the author to publish his own manuscript. A man may write without any intention to publish. His manuscript, however valuable, cannot, without his consent, be seized by his creditors as property. They are valueless to all the world except to the author and his representatives, or to such persons as he shall transfer them. But the author who publishes his work dedicates it to the public. He voluntarily incurs all the responsibility of the publisher. His object is to instruct or amuse mankind, and the more his work is kept circulated, the greater is the compliment to his ability as a writer. There is no reason, then, against a republication of the work by any one, except that it may reduce the profits of the author, and, unless he secures the sole right of republication by copyright under the statute, he cannot complain if others republish the work. Bartlett v. Crittenden (U. S.) 2 Fed. Cas. 967, 968.

DEDICATION IN PAIS.

The deliberate appropriation of land by the owner for any general and public use, by such act or conduct which evinces such intent, constitutes a dedication in pais absolutely, when followed by use or acceptance. Thus, where a person designates a broad and unplatted space as "Mechanics' Green," and another parcel as "Public Square," and such land was used as such, there arises a dedication in pais. Bates v. City of Beloit, 78 N. W. 1102, 1104, 103 Wis. 90.

DEDICATION TO PIOUS USES.

The mere appropriation of land by its owner to the uses of a church or of "public worship," in the sense in which that phrase is usually understood, is not sufficient to constitute a "dedication of land to pious uses." There must be a donation by the owner—some unequivocal act united with the intent to divest himself, to some extent, of the ownership or power of control over his property, and vest an independent and irrevocable interest therein in some other person or body. Attorney General v. Merrimack Mfg. Co., 80 Mass. (14 Gray) 586, 609 (citing Attorney General v. Lord Foley, 1 Dickens, 363.)

DEDUCE.

Mr. Webster says that "deduce" means to derive by logical process; to obtain or arrive at as the result of reasoning; to infer. Reasoning is nothing but the faculty of de-ducing unknown truths from principles already known; and the word is erroneously used in an instruction to the jury to determine the facts, and, from the facts ascertained, "to deduce the guilt or innocence of defendant." Hackett v. State, 13 Tex. App. 406, 413.

DEDUCT.

A will devising one-half of testator's estate, not otherwise disposed of, to a certain person, "deducting therefrom" the amount advanced to such person, construed to mean that the share to such devisee is to be diminished by bringing the advancement into hotchpot. Porter v. Collins, 7 Conn. 1, 5.

"Deduct" may mean the same thing as "exempt," and whatever is deducted under the provisions of a statute relating to taxation is ipso facto exempted or freed from the burden of taxation. State v. Eureka Consol. Min. Co., 8 Nev. 15, 23.

DEDUCTIONS.

The term "deductions," in Act Cong. June 7, 1872, § 23, requiring every master of a vessel paying off or discharging any seaman to deliver to him, or, if he be discharged before a shipping commissioner, to deliver to such shipping commissioner, a true and full account of his wages and all deductions, means deductions from wages to be paid, such as advances, moneys furnished during the voyage, supplies from the slop chest, etc., and expenses occasioned by desertion are not included. Stevenson v. Hare (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 47, 48.

By "deduction" is understood a portion or thing which an heir has a right to take from the mass of the succession before any partition takes place. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 1358.

Exemption distinguished.

Deductions and exemptions are two separate and distinct things, having no connection—a deduction being the taking of the subtrahend from the minuend, a subtraction; while exemption is an immunity or privilege, freedom from a charge or burden to which others are subject. Florer v. Sheridan, 36 N. E. 365, 369, 137 Ind. 28, 23 L. R. A. 278; State v. Smith, 63 N. E. 25, 29, 158 Ind. 543.

Upon the subject of an allowance for debts, Judge Cooley says: "Revenue laws sometimes permit taxpayers to deduct from the property to be taxed the debts owing by them. Sometimes the deductions are from credits only, sometimes from mortgages, sometimes from the aggregate of personal estate. The allowance is not in any proper sense an exemption, but is made by way of reaching the just amount of taxable property." Cooley, Tax'n, 174. Therefore Acts 1809, p. 422, § 1, providing for the deduction of mortgage indebtedness from the assessed value of real estate, is not an exemption law. State v. Smith, 63 N. E. 25, 29, 158 Ind. 543.

DEED.

See "Ancient Deed"; "Clear Deed"; "Good Deed"; "Good and Perfect Deed"; "Good and Sufficient Deed"; "Good Authentic Deed"; "Good Warranty Deed"; "Joint Deed"; "Latent Deed"; "Lawful Deed"; "Quitclaim Deed"; "Tax Deed"; "Valid and Sufficient Deed"; "Voluntary Deed"; "Warranty Deed."

A deed or contract is an instrument of writing passing a person's interest in real estate, although the right to its possession and enjoyment may not accrue until some future time. Reed v. Hazleton, 15 Pac. 177, 180, 37 Kan. 321.

9 Wm. III, c. 7, requiring the registration of deeds and conveyances, comprehends every species of act whereby one man can transfer property in houses and lands from himself to another. Dudley v. Sumner, 5 Mass. 438, 470.

A deed is a written instrument, signed, sealed, and delivered by the parties. Fisher v. Pender, 52 N. C. 483, 485.

The term "deed," as used in the chapter relating to conveyances, shall be construed to include stocks, leases, releases, and other conveyance or incumbrance under seal. Mills' Ann. St. Colo. 1891, § 456.

The term "deed," as used in the chapter relating to real property, shall be construed to embrace every instrument in writing by which any real estate or interest therein is created, aliened, mortgaged, or assigned, or by which the title to any real estate may be affected in law or equity, except last wills, and leases for one year or for a less time. Cobbey's Ann. St. Neb. 1903, § 10,247.

A deed is an instrument executed by a private citizen, and is, or was formerly, only known to be his act or deed because he delivered it as such. United States v. Planter (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 544, 545.

A deed consists of the names of the parties, the consideration for which the land was sold, a description of the subject granted, the quantity of interest conveyed, and, lastly, the conditions, reservations, and covenants, if there be any. Evenson v. Webster, 53 N. W. 747, 749, 3 S. D. 382, 44 Am. St. Rep. 802 (citing 4 Kent, Comm. 460).

Attestation essential.

The last requisite to the validity of a deed is an attestation or execution of it in the presence of witnesses, though this is necessary rather for preserving the evidence than for constituting the essence of the deed. The statutes prescribing the requisites of deeds vary in different states, and in some of them a deed, though executed in a manner other than that required by the statute, is sufficient to pass an equitable estate or interest. Thus, where a conveyance in Arkansas was unacknowledged and unattested, but the purchaser was placed in possession thereunder and claimed title, the deed was sufficient to convey an equitable right to the property. Stirman v. Cravens, 29 Ark. 548, 557. See, also, Allston v. Thompson (S. C.) Cheves, 271, 282.

Delivery and acceptance essential.

A deed is a writing executed and delivered, and delivery is essential to give it legal force. Of old the definition of a deed was "an instrument consisting of three things, namely, writing, sealing, and delivery, comprehending a bargain or contract between party and party, man or woman." Best v. Brown (N. Y.) 25 Hun, 223, 224 (citing Co. Litt. 171).

Delivery is the final act on the part of the grantor by which he consummates the purpose of his conveyance, and without it all other formalities which have preceded it are impotent to render it effectual as an instrument of title. Provart v. Harris, 150 Ill. 40, 36 N. E. 958, 959.

Conveyance in fee essential.

At common law a "deed" is "a writing sealed and delivered by the parties," but in ordinary language the term is used in a more limited and restricted sense, as a conveyance of a fee in land. Neither a mortgage nor a lease is usually spoken of as a deed. Devl. Deeds, § 5. Technically, a conveyance in fee is not necessary to constitute a deed. Sanders v. Riedinger, 30 App. Div. 277, 284, 51 N. Y. Supp. 937, 942.

Execution essential.

It seems to be the better rule that signing is not essential, even in deeds by natural persons, and it is not essential that the deed of a corporation be signed. Osborne v. Tunis, 25 N. J. Law (1 Dutch.) 633, 660.

Grantor and grantee essential.

A deed is a method by which the title and possession of real estate is transferred from one person to another, and there must be a grantor and a grantee. American Net & Twine Co. v. Mayo, 33 S. E. 523, 525, 97 Va. 182.

A deed is a writing sealed and delivered by the parties. This definition makes it essential, for an instrument to operate as a deed, that there should be both a grantor and grantee, so that a conveyance uncertain as to the person intended as grantee—as, for instance, where a grant is made to a neighbor—hood, or to one who is dead at the time of its execution, or to a purely fictitious person—is inoperative and void. Wiehl v. Robertson, 37 S. W. 274, 276, 97 Tenn. 458, 39 L. R. A. 423; Cleveland Nat. Bank v. Same, Id. (citing Thomas v. Inhabitants of Marshfield, 27 Mass. [10 Pick.] 364; Hunter v. Watson, 12 Cal. 363, 73 Am. Dec. 543; David v. Williamsburg City Fire Ins. Co., 83 N. Y. 265, 38 Am. Rep. 418).

Writing essential.

The word "deed" necessarily imports that there is a written instrument. Pierson v. Townsend (N. Y.) 2 Hill, 550, 551.

Where a statute speaks of a "deed," it must be taken in its technical sense, as understood at common law—that is, a writing sealed and delivered by the parties. Grogan v. Garrison, 27 Ohio St. 50, 63.

As agreement.

See "Agreement."

Assignment of mortgage.

The term "deed," as used in Comp. St. c. 78, § 16, requiring deeds, mortgages, and other instruments to be recorded in order to be valid as to subsequent purchasers, is defined by section 46 of the same chapter to embrace every instrument in writing by which any real estate or interest therein is created, aliened, mortgaged, or assigned, or by which the title to any real estate may be affected in law or in equity, except last wills and leases for one year or for a less time. An assignment of a real-estate mortgage securing a negotiable promissory note, to the indorsee of such note, is an instrument affecting the title to real estate, within the meaning of this definition. Ames v. Miller (Neb.) 91 N. W. 250, 251.

Chattel mortgage.

The word "deed," in a statute providing that every person who shall make or utter and publish any foreign record, deed, etc., shall be punished, must have the common-law definition. A deed is construed at common law to be a written instrument under seal, containing a contract or agreement which has been delivered by the party to be bound, and accepted by the obligee or covenantee; and within this definition is included a chattel mortgage. People v. Watkins, 64 N. W. 324, 106 Mich. 437.

As complete instrument.

The term "deed," as used in an indictment for the larceny thereof, imports a complete instrument, and it is therefore sufficient to describe it by name. State v. Hall, 85 Mo. 669, 671.

The word "deed," used in an indictment for forgery of itself, imports a completed instrument; and hence the indictment need not state that the instrument is genuine or operated to convey the land, it being sufficient to say that it purported to convey it. State v. Fisher, 65 Mo. 437, 438.

As contract.

A deed is the contract between the grantor and the grantee, although the grantee does not sign it. Wierengo v. American Fire Ins. Co., 57 N. W. 833, 835, 98 Mich. 621.

A deed is a contract executed. Even if not recorded, it passes the title as against the grantor, his heirs and devisees. Watkins v. Nugen (Ga.) 45 S. E. 262, 263.

A deed is a contract which derives its binding force from, and becomes operative by, the mutual assent of the parties to it, and hence without the acceptance of it by the grantee there can be no delivery. Tyler v. Cate, 45 Pac. 800, 802, 29 Or. 515.

A deed of land is intended to convey the title to the land, and is not intended to express the contract between the parties in pursuance of which the deed is given. Lynch v. Moser, 46 Atl. 153, 155, 72 Conn. 714.

As conveyance by way of gift.

The word "deed," as used in a transfer tax law, providing that a tax shall be paid when the transfer is of property made by a resident or nonresident, when such nonresident's property is within the state, by deed, grant, bargain, sale, or gift, made in contemplation of the death of the grantor, vendor, or donor, or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after such death, does not refer to conveyances of property by a deed made in the ordinary course of business for a valuable consideration, but is confined to conveyances of real property intended as gifts. In re Birdsall's Estate, 49 N. Y. Supp. 450, 461, 22 Misc. Rep. 180.

General assignment distinguished.

See "General Assignment."

Land patent.

See "Patent (Of Land)."

Lease.

A lease for years under seal is a deed, and, if it were a deed in relation to lands, tenements, or hereditaments, would be included in the fourteenth section of our act concerning conveyances (Revision, p. 153), providing that every deed or conveyance of or for land, tenements, or hereditaments, to any purchaser of the same, shall be recorded, though under the same section a lease for a term of years not under seal would not be included. Bramhall v. Hutchinson (N. J.) 7 Atl. 873, 875.

Mortgage.

"Deed," as used in a provision in a deed conveying land in fee simple, that, in case of a grantee's death without having disposed of the land by deed or will, the title should pass to certain others, is commonly understood to mean an instrument in writing, duly executed, conveying real estate, and does not include a mortgage. Lockridge v. McCommon, 38 S. W. 33, 35, 90 Tex. 234 (citing Hellman v. Howard, 44 Cal. 110).

Rev. St. Mo. § 699, providing that a husband and wife may convey the real estate of the wife, and the wife may relinquish her dower in the real estate of her husband, by their joint deed, includes a mortgage. Parsons v. Denis (U. S.) 7 Fed. 317.

Laws 1887, c. 47 (Gen. St. c. 40, § 2) providing that the validity of a deed of a wife's separate real estate, executed jointly with her husband, shall not be affected by the fact of her minority, should be construed to include a mortgage of real estate. Daley v. Minnesota Loan & Investment Co., 45 N. W. 1100, 1101, 43 Minn. 517.

A mortgage contained a reservation as follows: "Excepting so much out of said tracts of land as have been conveyed by M. by deed to different individuals." Held, that while the word "deed" is sometimes generic, and includes every writing or instrument under seal, in which sense a mortgage is included, it is frequently used in a much more limited sense, signifying a writing by which lands are conveyed; and, the latter being the more popular and usual signification, it should be construed as used in the mortgage with such signification, and hence it did not embrace prior mortgages. Eaton v. White, 18 Wis. 517, 519.

Comp. Laws 1857, § 4803, providing for the punishment of any person who shall utter any false or forged deed, means not only deeds of lands conveying the legal title, but includes a mortgage; the word "deed" having been employed in the broad legal sense in which it is understood at the common law. People v. Caton, 25 Mich. 388, 391.

In Code Pub. Gen. Laws, art. 16, § 23, relating to the recording of deeds, the word "deeds" is used in its general sense, and includes mortgages as well. Pfeaff v. Jones, 50 Md. 263, 271.

The term "deed," as generally understood, and as used in Rev. St. § 4106, providing the manner of executing a deed, mortgage, or lease of any estate or interest in real property, does not include an instrument purporting in the habendum clause to pass title absolutely in a certain bank, but afterward providing that it is in trust that the mortgagor is to hold possession of the premises until sold by the mortgagee, the proceeds to be applied in the payment of certain debts, etc. National Bank v. Tennessee Coal, Iron & R. Co., 57 N. E. 450, 452, 62 Ohio St. 564.

A mortgage is an executed or conditional transfer of the estate mortgaged. A mortgage is not to be regarded as a disposition of land by deed, within the meaning of the article of the Revised Statutes respecting uses and trusts. Bucklin v. Bucklin, *40 N. Y. (1 Keyes) 141, 145.

The term "deed," as used in St. § 2135, providing that a wife shall not be endowed with lands sold to satisfy a lien or incumbrance created by deed in which she joined, is not used in the ordinary sense of that term, as by it no lien is created against the grantors to satisfy which a sale of the land can be made. A mortgage of land is conveyance of it for the purpose of securing the payment of a debt. It is a deed creating a lien, and seems to be the very instrument described by the statute in which, if the wife joins, she is divested of dower, save in the surplus proceeds of the sale, if one be made to satisfy the lien so created. Morgan v. Wickliffe (Ky.) 72 S. W. 1122.

Satisfaction of mortgage.

Gen. St. c. 162, §§ 1, 2, making the forging of a deed a punishable offense, includes an instrument by which a mortgagee acknowledges payment and satisfaction of the mortgage, cancels and discharges the same, and releases and quitclaims to the mortgagor the premises conveyed. Merserve v. Commonwealth, 137 Mass. 109, 111.

Sealed instrument implied.

A deed is a writing or instrument written on paper or parchment, sealed, and delivered. Jeffery v. Underwood, 1 Ark. (1 Pike) 108, 112.

It is one of the necessary elements of a deed that it contain a seal; and a paper intended as a deed, though signed by the party, is not a deed unless sealed. Davis v. Brandon, 2 Miss. (1 How.) 154, 155.

A deed is a writing sealed and delivered by the parties. 2 Bl. Comm. 295. So that, in the definition of a bond as a deed, the word "deed" imports that the bond is sealed. Rondot v. Rogers Tp. (U. S.) 99 Fed. 202, 209, 39 C. C. A. 462.

A deed is an instrument in writing, signed, sealed, and delivered. The seal is what distinguishes it from a parol or simple contract. A paper in the form of a deed is not a deed without a seal. Strain v. Fitzgerald, 34 S. E. 929, 930, 128 N. C. 396.

The words "deed or writing obligatory" were said in Jackson v. Perkins (N. Y.) 2 Wend. 308, 317, to imply the sealing and delivery of the deed; and therefore all that is necessary in a pleading is to allege the execution of the deed or writing obligatory, and it is not necessary to allege sealing or delivery. Egan v. Horrigan, 51 Atl. 246, 248, 96 Me. 46.

In considering the validity of a deed executed in a foreign country, the court said: "We do not necessarily mean an instrument under seal. In many countries seals are unknown." Steingenberger v. Carr, 8 Man. & G. 191, 199.

An instrument without a seal does not constitute a deed, though in the body of the writing it is said that the parties have set their hands and seals. Williams v. State, 6 South. 831, 832, 25 Fla. 734, 6 L. R. A. 821.

Blackstone says that deeds serve to convey the property of lands and tenements from man to man, and that they are commonly denominated "conveyances." In England the word "conveyance" carries with it the idea of a sealed instrument. McCabe v. Hunter's Heirs, 7 Mo. 355, 357.

The use of the word "deed" ex vi termini implies a sealing and delivery, and whatever is necessary to constitute the solemnity of a deed; and a declaration is not insufficient because the instrument declared on is not alleged to have been sealed with the seal of the obligors. Hammond v. Alexander, 4 Ky. (1 Bibb) 333.

A "deed," in its legal sense, is an instrument in writing on paper or parchment, between parties able to contract, subscribed, sealed, and delivered. By 1 Rev. St. 1876, p. 363, note 1 (Act Dec. 23, 1859), the seal or ink scroll required at common law to the validity of a deed is no longer required. American Ins. Co. v. Avery, 60 Ind. 566, 572.

A "deed," at common law, is defined to be a written instrument under seal, containing a contract or agreement, which has been delivered by the party to be bound, and accepted by the obligee or covenantee. It must be between competent parties, and must be made without constraint. McMurtry v. Brown, 6 Neb. 368, 376.

A deed is a writing or instrument, written on paper or parchment, sealed and delivered, to prove and testify the agreement of the parties whose deed it is to the things contained in the deed. American Buttonhole, Overseaming & Sewing Mach. Co. v. Burlack, 14 S. E. 319, 320, 35 W. Va. 647.

The term "deed," in Oregon, is synonymous with "sealed instrument." McLeod v. Lloyd, 71 Pac. 795, 798, 43 Or. 260.

The very term "deed" implies a sealed instrument. Floyd v. Ricks, 14 Ark. 286, 295, 58 Am. Dec. 374.

The word "deed," when used in statutes, is applied to an instrument conveying lands, but does not imply a sealed instrument. Code Iowa 1897, § 48, subd. 20; Gen. St. Kan. 1901, § 7342, subd. 20.

All sealed instruments are deeds. Jerome v. Ortman, 33 N. W. 759, 66 Mich. 668.

Title bond distinguished.

There is a wide difference between a deed for land and a title bond. The one is the evidence of an executed contract; the other is the evidence of an unexecuted contract. The former is evidence that a sale has been made; the latter that a sale is to be made. The one is a sale, and the other a contract for a sale. Peterson v. Reichman, 23 S. W. 53, 54, 93 Tenn. 71 (citing Moseby v. Partee, 52 Tenn. [5 Helsk.] 30).

Warranty of title imported.

The word "deed," in a bond calling for a conveyance by deed, will not necessarily be construed to mean a deed in fee simple with covenants. Carver v. Williams, 10 Ind. 267, 268.

A stipulation to give a "deed" of premises contracted to be sold is fulfilled by executing a conveyance of the property without warranty or personal conveyances. A deed does not, ex vi termini, mean a deed with covenants of warranty, but only an instrument with apt terms conveying the property sold. Ketchum v. Evertson (N. Y.) 13 Johns. 359, 363, 7 Am. Dec. 384.

Where a contract proposed the erection of sixteen tenement buildings on certain property, of a certain description, and for a certain amount, for which the promisor agreed to give a deed for three of the tenements, the term "deed" meant a deed in fee simple. Ellis v. Burden, 1 Ala. 458, 467.

"Deed," as used in a contract to convey land, obligating the vendor to make a good and sufficient deed thereto, should be construed as requiring a conveyance in fee simple with covenants of warranty; and a deed without warranty or a union of the grantor's wife does not fulfill the contract. Tremain v. Liming (Ohio) 1 Wright, 644.

"Deed," as used in a contract for the sale of land obligating the vendor to make to the said vendee a "deed for the following land," etc., does not require that the deed should be a deed with covenants of warranty, but only requires an instrument which with apt terms was sufficient to convey the property sold. Bowen v. Vickers, 2 N. J. Eq. (1 H. W. Green) 520, 525, 35 Am. Dec. 516.

The word "deed," as used in an answer to an interrogatory in an application for insurance, asking the insured what his title or interest in the property was, did not constitute a warranty that the applicant had a grant in fee of a freehold estate, but merely that he had an interest in the land resting primarily on a deed or some title derived from a deed. Merrill v. Agricultural Ins. Co., 73 N. Y. 452, 456, 29 Am. Rep. 184.

The word "deed," as used in a contract whereby one of the parties obligates himself to make a deed to the other, imports that the conveyance shall give a sufficient title. Parker v. McAllister, 14 Ind. 12, 16.

Under a contract of sale of real estate providing that upon the purchaser making certain payments a deed will be executed for the land, by covenanting to execute a deed no greater duty can be intended than to execute a conveyance or assurance of the property which may be good and perfect without warranty or personal covenants. Its meaning in such contract is clear and decisive, and will not, even by implication, admit of a more extended construction or definition. Van Eps v. Schenectady City (N. Y.) 12 Johns. 436, 442, 443, 7 Am. Dec. 830.

Will distinguished.

A deed must pass a present interest in the property, although the right to possession and enjoyment may not accrue until some future time. It is distinguished from a will, which does not pass any interest until after the death of the maker. Thus, an instrument which purports to be a deed, uses the language ordinarily implied in deeds, conveys a present interest to trustees named, and is executed and acknowledged as a deed, is a deed, notwithstanding a reservation of the power of revocation, modification, or substitution of the trusts thereby exercised within a certain time. Bowdoin College v. Merritt (U. S.) 75 Fed. 480, 483.

In determining whether an instrument be a will or a deed, the main question is, did the maker intend any estate or interest whatever to vest before his death and upon the execution of the paper, or, in other words, did he intend that all the interest and estate should take effect only after his death? If the former, it is a deed; if the latter, a will; and it is immaterial whether he call it a deed or will. Whitten v. McFall, 26 South. 131, 132, 122 Ala. 619; Abney v. Moore, 18 South. 60, 61, 106 Ala. 131. See, also, Adair v. Craig, 33 South. 902, 135 Ala. 332.

It may be laid down as a general rule that a written instrument which discloses the intention of the maker respecting the posthumous determination of his property, and which is not to operate until after his death, is testamentary in its character, and not a deed or contract, and may be revoked. Hazleton v. Reed, 26 Pac. 450, 451, 46 Kan. 73, 26 Am. St. Rep. 86.

A will is an instrument by which a person makes a disposition of property to take effect after his death, and, as its operation is postponed during life, it is ambulatory and revocable; and it is this quality which distinguishes it from deeds and similar instruments taking effect, if at all, at the time of execution. Jordan v. Jordan's Adm'r, 65 Ala. 301, 305; McDaniels v. Johns, 45 Miss. 631, 641. See, also, Macrae v. Macrae (Tenn.) 57 S. W. 423, 424.

In order that a paper be held a deed, it must convey an interest to take effect in present, though the enjoyment of this interest may rest in futuro. It is otherwise as to a will. It speaks as of the death of the testator. The instrument may be in the form of a deed; it may be supported by a consideration, and by its maker be called a deed; yet, if it purports to convey a title which does not arise until the death of the maker, it is nevertheless a will. Whether a paper is to operate as a will or deed depends upon the intention of the maker, to be gathered from its language. An instrument executed by a husband, reciting a gift of land to the wife, to take effect after her husband's death, and reserving the right to sell or dispose of it during his life, in which event the instrument is to be void, is a testamentary devise, and not a deed, and hence did not vest any present interest in the land in the wife which would pass by her conveyance during the life of the husband. Ellis v. Pearson, 58 S. W. 318, 104 Tenn. 591.

An instrument in the form of a deed, providing, "This deed is to go into effect after the death of [the grantor], she claiming her right to hold the same as long as she lives," is a deed, and not a will. Seals v. Pierce, 10 S. E. 589, 83 Ga. 787, 20 Am. St. Rep. 344.

An instrument purporting to be a deed, by which the grantor gives to his son certain property after his death and the death of his wife, is not a deed, but a testamentary paper, and cannot be read to the jury, in any case affecting the title to personalty in a court of common law, until it has passed to probate before the ordinary. Hester v. Young, 2 Ga. (2 Kelly) 31, 50.

DEED IN BLANK.

Two conditions are essential to make a deed executed in blank operate as a conveyance of the property described in it: The blank must be filled by the parties authorized to fill it, and this must be done before or at the time of the delivery of the deed to the grantee named. Allen v. Whitrow, 3 Sup. Ct. 517, 523, 110 U. S. 119, 28 L. Ed. 90.

DEED IN FEE.

A bond for a deed of conveyance in fee of the legal title means a good and sufficient conveyance with the usual covenants of the vendor. Rudd v. Savelli, 44 Ark. 145, 152.

A contract for the sale of land, providing for its conveyance by "deed in fee simple and free from all incumbrances," does not mean a deed with a covenant against incumbrances, there being a mortgage on the land, but requires the land to be actually free from incumbrances. Moody v. Spokane & U. H. St. Ry. Co., 32 Pac. 751, 5 Wash. 699.

DEED IN WRITING.

The expression "deed in writing" is but a common mode of expressing fully and explicitly to the popular understanding the technical idea legally implied by a single deed—that is, a writing sealed. Taylor v. Morton, 35 Ky. (5 Dana) 365, 368.

DEED INTER PARTES.

A deed inter partes, whereby an estate is conveyed, if accepted by the grantee, is in legal effect the deed of both parties; and a stipulation in such a deed by the grantee that he will assume and pay the debt secured by the mortgage on the premises, for the payment of which the grantor is personally liable, is a contract by the grantee with the grantor to pay the mortgage debt, especially where the mortgage debt is computed as part of the consideration money for the conveyance. Green v. Stone, 34 Atl. 1099, 1100, 54 N. J. Eq. 387, 55 Am. St. Rep. 577.

DEED OF BARGAIN AND SALE.

See "Bargain and Sale."

DEED OF SEPARATION.

Deeds of separation are instruments by which, through the medium of some third party acting as a trustee, provision is made by a husband for separation from his wife. Whitney v. Whitney, 36 N. Y. Supp. 891, 892, 15 Misc. Rep. 72.

DEED OF TRUST.

See "Trust Deed."

DEED POLL.

The proprietors of the province of Pennsylvania, in the beginning, allowed no one man to locate and survey more than 300 acres. To evade this rule in after times it was the custom of speculators in land to make application in the name of a third person, and, after obtaining the warrant, to take from them what was called a "deed poll," or a brief conveyance of their inchoate, equitable claim. Herron v. Dater, 7 Sup. Ct. 620, 624, 120 U. S. 464, 30 L. Ed. 748 (citing Evans v. Patterson, 71 U. S. [4 Wall.] 224, 18 L. Ed. 393).

DEED WITH COVENANT OF WARRANTY.

The use of the phrase "deed with covenant of warranty," in a contract to convey land by a deed with covenant of warranty, means, not merely that the lands will be conveyed by a deed containing such a covenant, but that the grantee has the power to give a deed which will carry with it an indefeasible title to the property. Judson v. Wass (N. Y.) 11 Johns. 525, 528, 6 Am. Dec. 392.

DEEDED.

The word "deeded" is an apt word to signify the transmission of real estate. Dunham v. Marsh, 30 Atl. 473, 474, 52 N. J. Eq. (7 Dick.) 256.

DEEM.

The use of the word "deem," in a charter granting a municipality the right to charge such sums as they shall deem fit for licenses, confers full power over the subject, and authorizes the use of the power to license as a means for taxation if the corporation sees fit so to do. Adams Exp. Co. v. City of Owensboro, 85 Ky. 265, 3 S. W. 370, 371.

As adjudge or determine.

The word "deemed" means to hold in belief, estimation, or opinion; to judge; adjudge; decide; sentence; condemn; to have or to be of an opinion. Its synonyms are "esteem" and "suppose." Cory v. Spencer, 73 Pac. 920, 921, 67 Kan. 648, 63 L. R. A. 275.

"Deemed," as used in legislative expression, is not materially different in meaning than "adjudged." To damn or condemn is synonymous with to "deem," "think," or "judge" any one to be guilty or to be criminal; to give judgment or sentence, or to declare the penalty of punishment. Blaufus v. People, 69 N. Y. 107, 111, 25 Am. Rep. 148 (citing Rich. Dict.).

"Deem" means to hold in belief, estimation, or opinion; to have or be of an opinion. Its synonyms are "esteem" and "suppose"; and as used in Const. Kan. art. 5, § 3, providing that for the purpose of voting no person shall be deemed to have acquired a residence while kept at any almshouse or other asylum at public expense, means shall be adjudged or declared to have gained a residence, and not merely raise a presumption of disqualification. Lawrence v. Leidigh, 50 Pac. 600, 602, 58 Kan. 594, 62 Am. St. Rep. 631 (citing Commonwealth v. Pratt, 132 Mass. 246; Blaufus v. People, 69 N. Y. 107, 111, 25 Am. Rep. 148; Leonard v. Grant [U. S.] 5 Fed. 11).

In Rev. St. § 2922, relating to the valuation of goods, imported, by appraisers, and authorizing the appraisers to examine any person on oath touching any matter or thing which they may deem material in ascertaining the value, "deem" means judge; determine on consideration. "The primary meaning of the word is to form a judgment; to conclude on consideration." United States v. Doherty (U. S.) 27 Fed. 730, 734 (citing Worcester's Dict.).

In a resolution of a common council directing an assessment for a street improvement, requiring the assessors to assess the amount to the property deemed benefited, "deem" should be construed to mean a direction to the assessors to investigate, consider, and determine, from which they may pronounce a proper judgment. Broezel v. City of Buffalo, 6 N. Y. Supp. 723, 726, 53 Hun, 631, note.

"Deemed" is the equivalent of "considered" or "adjudged," and whatever an act requires to be deemed or taken as true of any person or thing must in law be considered as having been duly considered or adjudged, and have full force and effect accordingly." Leonard v. Grant (U. S.) 5 Fed. 11, 16.

"Deemed," as used in 14 Stat. 144, declaring that dealers in canned goods under certain circumstances shall be deemed the manufacturers thereof, means judged; determined. The word imports that such dealers shall be considered, treated, and held liable under the act as if they were manufacturers, notwithstanding they are not such in fact. Cardinel v. Smith (U. S.) 5 Fed. Cas. 45, 47.

To "deem" means to think, judge, or hold as an opinion; decide or believe on consideration. A person doubting the occurrence of a proposition cannot be said to "deem" it incorrect, and hence the expression of a doubt by the judge of the Court of Appeals as to whether the conclusion reached in the cause on appeal can be harmonized with the former opinion of the Supreme Court is insufficient to confer jurisdiction on the Supreme Court, under Const. § 6, providing that when the Court of Appeals shall render a decision which a judge shall "deem" contrary to any previous decision of the Supreme Court it must transfer the case to the Supreme Court. Smith v. Missouri Pac. Ry. Co., 44 S. W. 718, 719, 143 Mo. 33.

As believe.

Where a chattel mortgage provides that, if the mortgagee at any time "deem himself in danger" of losing the debt by delaying the collection thereof until the time limited by the mortgage for the payment thereof, he may take possession of the goods wherever found at any time, it means that the mortgagee may take possession whenever he, acting in good faith, believes he is in danger. Barrett v. Hart, 42 Ohio St. 41, 45, 51 Am. Rep. 801.

As considered or taken to be.

"Deemed" is the past participle of the transitive verb "deem," which is defined as "to account, to esteem"; and hence, as used in Const. art. 6, § 5, providing that no person shall be "deemed" to have gained or lost a residence while kept at any public asylum or almshouse, means that no person shall be accounted or shall be regarded as having gained or lost his residence. Powell v. Spackman, 65 Pac. 503, 504, 7 Idaho, 692, 54 L. R. A. 378.

There is no distinction in point of law between a person who, by Mutiny Act, § 55, is to be "deemed" to be enlisted as a "soldier in Her Majesty's service," and a person who is actually in all respects a soldier de facto. When an act of Parliament says that a person is to be "deemed" to be in any particular capacity, that must be understood to mean that he is thereafter taken as actually the very person that he is deemed to be. Wolton v. Gavin, 16 Q. B. 48, 81.

In an act providing that after the death of the husband the wife's legal settlement shall be "deemed" to be the place where he was last legally settled, it is equivalent to the expression "shall be taken to be." Burrell Tp. v. Pittsburgh Guardians of the Poor, 62 Pa. 472, 474, 1 Am. Rep. 441.

Hartley's Dig. art. 2420, providing that every female, under the age of 21 years, who shall marry in accordance with the laws of the state, from and after the time of such marriage "shall be deemed to be of full age," means that the persons spoken of shall be deemed to be of full age for all purposes; that is, it not only gives them all the capacities, rights, and privileges of persons of full age, but also deprives them of any advantage which they might claim by reason of nonage. Thompson v. Cragg, 24 Tex. 582, 598.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, provides that every one save the contractor must, within 30 days after the completion of any building, file his statement for a lien. That section was amended in 1887 by adding that cessation for labor for 30 days on any unfinished building "shall be deemed equivalent to completion." Held, that the phrase "shall be deemed equivalent to completion" means shall be in legal effect equal to a completion; that is, shall be treated, for the purpose of filing a lien, as an actual completion. Kerckhoff-Cuzner Mill & Lumber Co. v. Olmstead, 24 Pac. 648, 649, 85 Cal. 80.

Within the statute providing that a legacy to a creditor shall not be deemed in compensation of the debt, "deemed" simply means that no interpretation unfavorable to the creditor shall be placed on the testament by the fact alone of the legacy to the creditor. It is a question of interpretation whether the testator intended the legacy to be in satisfaction of the debt. Some mention must be made in the testament of the debt, and the testator's intent must be gathered from the testament whether he intended the legacy to be in satisfaction of the debt. Succession of Jackson, 17 South. 598, 599, 47 La. Ann. 1089.

"Deemed," as used in a statute providing that the bargainee of the use shall be deemed to be in possession of the land, does not mean actual possession, but merely means that in contemplation of law the possession is in such purchaser. Egbert v. Chew, 14 N. J. Law (2 J. S. Green) 446, 461.

As involving discretion.

The word "deem," as used in Customs Administrative Act 1890, § 13, providing that the decision of the appraiser shall be final and conclusive as to the dutiable value of merchandise, unless the collector shall deem the payment of the merchandise too low, necessarily involves the exercise of discretion on the part of the collector. His calling and the nature of his business place him in a position where he is necessarily familiar with the value of imported merchandise and with the facts bearing upon questions of appraisal. United States v. Loeb (U. S.) 99 Fed. 723, 733.

The act of February 16, 1863, declaring that the board of supervisors "may, if 'deemed' advisable," levy a special tax to pay a judgment against the county, held to be mandatory, and not to give the board discretion in the matter, the decision being based on the construction of "may" as "shall." Supervisors v. United States, 71 U. S. (4 Wall.) 435, 446, 18 L. Ed. 419.

In an application by a bank to a surety company for a bond for its teller, one of the questions asked was, "Have you heard or known of anything unfavorable as to his habits or association, past or present, or of any matters concerning him about which you 'deem' it advisable for the company to make inquiry?" It was held that the word "deem" might be said to give a considerable discretion, but it was not a discretion to be abused; and where the president of the bank had heard of speculation by the teller, and knew that speculating was something unfavorable to his habits, his failure to inform the surety company thereof would defeat a recovery on the bond. Guarantee Co. of North America v. Mechanics' Sav. Bank & Trust Co., 22 Sup. Ct. 124, 133, 183 U. S. 402, 46 L. Ed. 253.

DEEMED BEST.

A will giving to a certain person the use of testatrix's house and furniture, and providing that "if it shall be deemed best" to have the house sold the beneficiary might have the interest for her use, with the furniture, means that the house should be sold if in the course of the administration of the estate it should be found necessary or advisable to take that course. Chandler v. Rider, 102 Mass. 268, 269.

DEEPEN.

Land had been conveyed with the privilege of deepening the ditch leading from the premises, to drain the same over the grantor's land as deep as the grantees might desire. Held, that the phrase "with the privilege of deepening the ditch" should be construed as meaning that the grantee should have the usual mode of obtaining such a ditch, and that the privilege was granted of widening the ditch at the top so far as necessary to deepen it. Collins v. Driscoll, 34 Conn. 43, 47.

DEFACE.

In a statute fixing the penalty for altering or defacing the brand put on any cattle, the words "altering or defacing" are not synonymous terms. "Defacing" would be the obliterating; "altering" would be changing from what it was before into a different brand. And, where the first brand consisted of two letters, the addition of another letter would be "altering" the brand, but not "defacing" it. Linney v. State, 6 Tex. 1, 2, 55 Am. Dec. 756.

DEFALCATION.

See, also, "Default."

The word "defalcation" means, according to Johnson, "diminution, abatement, excision of any part of a customary allowance." He derives the verb "defalcate" from the Latin "defalco"—"I mow or cut off with a scythe." McDonald v. Lee's Adm'r, 12 La. 435, 436.

"Defalcation" is defined by Bouvier as a reduction of the claim of one of the contracting parties against the other by deducting from it a smaller claim due by the former to the latter; and by Webster as a cutting off, a reduction, a deficit, a withdrawal; or that which is cut off, diminished, or abated. Council Bluffs Iron Works v. Cuppey, 41 Iowa, 104, 109.

If there is a debt existing for property or money embezzled or misappropriated by a person occupying a technical fiduciary position, there is a "defalcation" if the money or property is gone and has not been made good. It must be conceded that the word "defalcation" is broader than "embezzlement" or "misappropriation," and the use of the language "defalcation while acting as an officer or in any fiduciary capacity" in the bankruptcy act, forbidding the discharge under such circumstances, would seem to imply and include either embezzlement or misappropriation, or both. It was supposed that the use of the language employed would forbid the discharge of any person from a debt created by his fraud or by his embezzlement or misappropriation of funds or property, in whatsoever capacity or relation acting, and also the debts created by the defalcation of an officer or person occupying the technical trust or fiduciary relation known to and recognized by our law. In re Butts (U. S.) 120 Fed. 966, 970.

The word "defalcation" in the bankruptcy act of 1867, excepting from the operation of the discharge debts created by fraud or embezzlement and defalcation, was con-ined to public officers and those acting in a fiduciary capacity. Crawford v. Burke, 66 N. E. 833, 835, 201 Ill. 581.

"Defalcation," as used in a note or bill under seal by which the promisor agreed to pay the same without defalcation, means without the right to set off another account or another contract, and does not mean that the note shall be paid without defense if a valid defense exists thereto, as fraud or want of consideration. Houk v. Foley, 2 Pen. & W. 245, 250.

The words "without defalcation or discount," added to a promissory note, do not alter its legal effect. Cumberland Bank v. Hann, 18 N. J. Law (3 Har.) 222, 224.

"Defalcation" is a legal right secured to a defendant who has demands against the plaintiff, due in the same right, and payable when suit was commenced. Tagg v. Bowman (Pa.) 16 Wkly. Notes Cas. 159, 161.

The words "without defalcation," in a note, imply that it is to be paid to the holder, without any diminution or claim to set off or otherwise, by the maker and indorser. McDonald v. Lee's Adm'r, 12 La. 435, 438.

If a man promise to pay a note "without defalcation or discount," the effect is that if there happens to be any failure of consideration between the maker of the note and the person to whom it is made, or any subsequent equities arise between them, they must adjust those matters in a separate action between themselves, without involving the indorsee in their disputes. Tillou v. Britton, 9 N. J. Law (4 Halst.) 120, 134.

DEFALK.

"Defalk" means the act of a debtor in taking a debt due him, or portion thereof, from the fund in his hands belonging to a creditor. Johnson v. Johnson R. Signal Co., 40 Atl. 193-197, 57 N. J. Eq. 79.

As used in a statute giving a right of appeal in case any part of plaintiff's demand or of the defendant's counterclaim or set-off, exceeding $5, is disallowed or defalked by the justice, the word "defalked" means a letting off or a reduction to some extent of a claim which is proved, whether it be from a claim made and proved by the plaintiff, or from a set-off made and proved by the defendant. The word "defalked" implies proof of an alleged claim—proof of some amount from which the defalcation is to be made. Pepper v. Warren (Del.) 43 Atl. 91, 92, 2 Marv. 225.

DEFAMATION—DEFAMATORY.

See "Public Defamation."

Any written words are defamatory which impute that the plaintiff has been guilty of any crime, fraud, dishonesty, immorality, vice, or dishonorable conduct, or has been accused or suspected of any such conduct; and so, too, are all words which hold the plaintiff up to contempt, hatred, scorn, or ridicule, and which thus, by engendering an evil opinion of him in the minds of right-thinking men, tend to deprive him of their friendly intercourse and society. Houston Printing Co. v. Moulden, 41 S. W. 381, 386, 15 Tex. Civ. App. 574.

It may be safely said that any words, if false and malicious, imputing conduct which injuriously affects a man's reputation, or which tends to degrade him in society or bring him into public hatred or contempt, are in their nature "defamatory," and either actionable per se, or may be made actionable by proper innuendoes, or by alleging and proving special damages. Young v. McRae, 3 Best & S. 264; Lynch v. Knight, 9 H. L. Cas. 589. A publication that describes a fire in plaintiff's building, and also refers to two previous fires in the same building, and closes with these words: "Every fire in this building has started on the upper floor, and twice in R.'s printing establishment"—contains no defamatory language, and is not capable of meaning to charge R., the owner of the printing office, suing for libel, with incendiarism. Reid v. Providence Journal Co., 37 Atl. 637, 638, 20 R. I. 120.

"Defamatory words," in common parlance, are such as impute some moral delinquency or some disreputable conduct to the person of whom they are spoken. Glendon v. Dwyer, 33 N. Y. Supp. 754, 756, 87 Hun, 246 (citing Moore v. Francis, 121 N. Y. 199, 23 N. E. 1127, 8 L. R. A. 214, 18 Am. St. Rep. 810); Gallagher v. Bryant, 60 N. Y. Supp. 844, 845, 44 App. Div. 527.

Language may be libelous although it imports no criminal offense. It is enough if it is such as to subject the plaintiff to obloquy, reproach, or disgrace. It follows that the imputation of moral turpitude by means of a published writing is clearly libelous. Thus a publication that plaintiff has made a confession concerning a murder by another person, and that plaintiff has all along been suspected of knowing all the details of the criminal's actions, is libelous. Gallagher v. Bryant, 60 N. Y. Supp. 844, 845, 44 App. Div. 527.

"Defamation" is defined by Webster as the taking from another's reputation. Words which produce any perceptible injury to the reputation of another are called "defamatory." The defamation is a false publication calculated to bring one into disrepute. To publish of one that he has owed for several years for medical services, and that when sued therefor he has cowardly slunk behind the statute of limitations, does not constitute a defamation. Hollenbeck v. Hall, 72 N. W. 518, 519, 103 Iowa, 214, 39 L. R. A. 734, 64 Am. St. Rep. 175.

Words which produce any perceptible injury to the reputation of another are a "defamation," or any false publication calculated to bring one into disrepute. Thus where a letter contained statements which, if true, show that a lawyer is not an honest man and not entitled to public confidence, so that no discreet public man believing such statements would trust him with business, the publication is libelous, if not proven. Mosnat v. Snyder, 75 N. W. 356, 358, 105 Iowa, 500.

DEFAMATORY PUBLICATION.

"A defamatory publication under the pretext of a privileged communication, where the privilege does not exist, is a publication without just cause or excuse, and in a legal sense malicious, and therefore actionable, though it be made without a malicious motive." King v. Patterson, 9 Atl. 705, 706, 49 N. J. Law (20 Vroom) 417, 60 Am. Rep. 622.

The word "defamatory" does not include the element of malice. A defamatory publication is one which is false and calculated to bring the person defamed into disrepute, but it is not necessarily malicious. Marks v. Baker, 9 N. W. 678, 680, 28 Minn. 162.

DEFAULT.

See, also, "Defalcation."

A default is the failure or omission to do something required. Bryan v. Alexander (U. S.) 4 Fed. Cas. 506, 507.

"Default" is defined as a failure in the performance or fulfillment of an obligation, neglect or omission of a legal requirement, a wrong action, fault, transgression, something wrongful, some omission to do that which ought to have been done. As used in Const. art. 14, § 2, rendering one who is in default as custodian or collector of public moneys ineligible to hold office, the term "default" implies more than a civil liability. There must exist a willful omission to account and pay over, with a corrupt intent, or such a flagrant disregard of duty as to fairly justify the inference that his conduct was willful and corrupt. State v. Moores, 73 N. W. 299, 305, 52 Neb. 770.

In passing upon the meaning of the words "debt, default, and miscarriage," it is said they apply to guaranties for an existing debt, guaranties for future debts, or to some past or future default in duty by a third person. Wood on Frauds, § 114. The word "miscarriage" has a broader meaning than either "debt" or "default," and includes the failure by a third party to succeed in a proposed business, regardless of the fact whether its failure to do so would entitle the plaintiff to an action at law or not. The requirement that an actionable duty shall exist was made first by the court in cases of debt. The same requirement was later extended to default, meaning default in any duty and for the same reason. But the reason does not exist in the case of miscarriage—that is, the act of a third party—and this requirement should not be made. In other words, if any meaning is to be given to the word, it must mean something different or broader than "debt" or "default," and this is the only distinction that can be made. Gansey v. Orr, 73 S. W. 477, 481, 173 Mo. 532.

In an executory contract for the sale of land, the mere fact that the purchase money is due and has not been paid does not create a forfeiture, nor is such neglect regarded by a court of equity as a default until there has been an offer by the other party to pay. Wakefield v. Johnson, 28 Ark. 506, 509.

The word "default," in a bill of sale providing that in case of default in any payment the seller may treat the sale as annulled and take the property, must be taken to mean a nonpayment by a party bound to pay, without the consent of the parties having a right to waive the payment; and the omission to pay by the consent of the person who is to receive payment does not constitute a default. Cole v. Hines, 32 Atl. 190, 198, 81 Md. 476, 32 L. R. A. 455.

"Default," as used in a stipulation providing that in case a party should make default in the payment of any one of certain notes made by him, according to its terms, then immediately on such default all of the notes remaining due and unpaid should become and be forthwith due and payable, anything in the terms of such notes to the contrary notwithstanding, and the holders of the notes should be at liberty forthwith to enter judgment by default, cannot be construed to mean simply a neglect or refusal to pay on presentation at the appointed place during business hours on the day named, but means a failure to pay after the day on which the note became due had fully elapsed. The maker could not be said to be "in default" until a right of action had accrued against him thereon, and no suit is maintainable on the note until a complete expiration of the last day of payment. Osborn v. Rogers, 1 N. Y. Supp. 623, 624, 49 Hun, 245.

An improvement certificate of a city provided that the city should make and collect an assessment for the improvement with due diligence, and that, in case the assessment should not be collected to meet the certificate within two years from the date of confirmation, the city would pay the amount of the certificate upon 30 days' notice of the default of the collection of the certificate. Held, that the word "default" did not necessarily imply culpability, as it often signifies only failure. Dime Sav. Inst. v. City of Hoboken, 42 N. J. Law (13 Vroom) 283, 288.

"Default," as used in a sheriff's accountable receipt providing for the payment of the amount of a debt in default of the delivery of the goods for which the receipt is given, means not the mere fact of the non-delivery of the goods, but a failure to deliver amounting to a breach of the contract of bailment. Any fact which would excuse the maker of the receipt from returning the property would exempt him from liability to pay the stipulated measure of damages, for in such case there would be no default. Mason v. Aldrich, 30 N. W. 884, 885, 36 Minn. 283.

In charter party.

In one sense any failure is a "default," whether it arises from the omission to perform the contract or from a neglect of duty. In many reported cases the omission to pay a debt or to perform a contract is spoken of as a "default." Thus, as used in a charter party providing that demurrage is payable only for each day of detention by default of the charterers or their agent, the word "default" means omission to perform the contract, and not negligence or willful omission. Burrill v. Crossman (U. S.) 69 Fed. 747, 752, 16 C. C. A. 381.

"Default," as used in a demurrage clause stipulating that the charterers of the boat shall be answerable only for detention which may result from default, means only a non-performance of contract duty—a failure to do that which such parties had contracted to do. 1,600 Tons of Nitrate of Soda v. McLeod (U. S.) 61 Fed. 849, 851, 10 C. C. A. 115.

A proviso in a charter party against liability for detention, unless "by default" of the charterers, exonerates the charterer from delay occasioned by superior force acting directly on the discharge of that cargo, and not from the direct action of such force, which by its operation on other vessels has caused a crowded state of the docks. It exempts him only from delay from causes beyond his control, acting directly to retard the discharging. The default does not mean negligence, but a failure of contract on their part, unless it is caused by direct and immediate vis major, or something like it. Thatcher v. Boston Gaslight Co. (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 874.

"Default of the charterer," as used in a charter party specifying that the charterer shall pay damage for detention of the vessel, provided such delay shall happen by default of the charterer, does not include a delay caused by the charterer requiring the shipper, after the delivery of a portion of the goods at one dock, to move to another dock, in which several days are lost by reason of the weather, there being a custom by which the charterer could require the goods to be delivered at the two different docks. The Mary E. Taber (U. S.) 16 Fed. Cas. 978, 979.

In practice.

"Default," as defined in Burrill's Law Dictionary, means: "In practice, an omission, neglect, or failure." When a defendant in an action at law omits to plead within the time allowed, or fails to appear on trial, he is said to "make default." Page v. Sutton, 29 Ark. 304, 306.

The term "default," when used in practice, is defined to be the nonappearance of a plaintiff or defendant at court within the time prescribed by law to prosecute his claim or make his defense. The term when applied to a defendant is frequently used in a much wider sense, and a failure to enter a plea, answer, affidavit of defense, etc., as well as for want of appearance, is included in the definition thereof. Lawler v. Bashford-Burmister Co. (Ariz.) 46 Pac. 72, 73. See, also, Steenrod's Adm'r v. Wheeling, P. & B. R. Co., 25 W. Va. 133, 137.

A default admits only what is averred in the declaration. Schueler v. Mueller, 61 N. E. 1044, 193 Ill. 402.

The definition of "default" as a failure to appear and contest a point of law or fact by presentation of counter argument or proof has been applied in many cases. Forgotson v. Becker, 81 N. Y. Supp. 321, 322, 39 Misc. Rep. 813.

Default is a judgment for want of appearance. Buena Vista Freestone Co. v. Parrish, 34 W. Va. 652, 654, 12 S. E. 817.

A default admits the cause of action and the material and traversable averments of a declaration, although not the amount of damages. A judgment by default in assumpsit, where an account is filed in the declaration, is an admission of indebtedness for the articles charged; but the value of the articles and the amount of indebtedness require to be proved. Grinnell v. Bebb, 85 N. W. 467, 468, 126 Mich. 157.

A default, in an action sounding in damages or tort, is an admission that plaintiff has a cause of action as alleged, though by reason of the statute defendant is permitted to controvert the quantum thereof. Whipple v. Southern Pac. Co., 55 Pac. 975, 976, 34 Or. 370.

A default has practically the same effect as a verdict. Until set aside, it is a final determination of the matters set up in a declaration. The default which is an admission of the plaintiff's case stands in the place of a trial in a litigated case. Hibernia

Savings & Loan Soc. v. Churchill, 61 Pac. 278, 280, 128 Cal. 633, 79 Am. St. Rep. 73.

Section 3886 of the Revision declares that judgment of nonsuit or by default in justice's court may be set aside by the justice, at any time within six days, if the party applying therefor can show satisfactory excuse for the default. Held, that the word "default" means where a defendant does not appear, and cannot be applied to a mere failure to appear on the day to which a cause has been continued, defendant having once appeared and answered. Douglass v. Langdon, 29 Iowa, 245, 247.

The word "default" signifies that there has not been an appearance at any stage of the action by the party in default. "Default," as used in our statutes, is an antithesis of appearance. It is distinguished from "absence," which means that the party was not present at a particular time. Covart v. Has-kins, 18 Pac. 522, 523, 89 Kan. 571.

DEFAULT DAY.

Appearance day synonymous, see "Appearance Day."

DEFAULT IN OFFICE.

A "default in office" is a noncompliance with the statute in discharging any of the duties proposed. Carpenter v. Doody (N. Y.) 1 Hilt. 465, 468.

DEFAULT JUDGMENT.

See "Judgment by Default."

DEFAULT OF ISSUE.

See "In Default of Issue."

DEFAULTER.

Webster defines the word "defaulter" to be one who makes default; who fails to perform a public duty; who fails to account for public money; a delinquent. Walter v. Erdman, 4 Pa. Super. Ct. 348, 355.

A "defaulter" is defined in Anderson's Law Dictionary as one whose peculations have brought him within the cognizance of the law, to the extent at least of excluding him from a public trust. State v. Moores, 52 Neb. 770, 787, 73 N. W. 299.

When employed to explain a disqualification for holding a public office, the term "defaulter" has but one meaning in the minds of persons of ordinary intelligence who have a common familiarity with the English language and its most popular idioms. No one will naturally connect it with a mere delinquency as to minor social obligations or the payment of ordinary debts. The universal application of the word in that connection is matter for judicial notice. It describes one whose peculations have brought him within the cognizance of the law, to the extent at least of excluding him from a public trust. State v. Kountz, 12 Mo. App. 511, 513.

DEFEASANCE.

Bouvier in his Law Dictionary defines "defeasance," as applied to contracts, to be an instrument which defeats the force or operation of some other deed or of an estate. That which is in the same deed is called a "condition"; and that which is in another deed is a "defeasance." Simmons v. West Virginia Ins. Co., 8 W. Va. 474, 486 (citing Bouv. Law Dict.).

A "defeasance" is a collateral deed, made at the same time with a feoffment or other conveyance, containing certain conditions upon the performance of which the estate then created may be defeated or totally undone. Miller v. Quick, 59 S. W. 955, 956, 158 Mo. 495; Harrison v. Trustees of Phillips' Academy, 12 Mass. 456, 463; Shaw v. Irskin, 43 Mo. 371, 373; Flagg v. Mann, Fed. Cas. No. 4,847.

Lord Coke has given a very correct definition of a "defeasance" in stating its derivation. It is, says he (Co. Litt. 236b), fetched from the French word "defaire," i. e., to defeat or undo, "infecum reddere quod factum." The true meaning of this language is that it is to make void the principal deed. Flagg v. Mann (U. S.) 9 Fed. Cas. 202, 222.

"A 'defeasance' is an instrument which avoids or defeats the force and operation of some other deed, and that which in the same deed would be called a 'condition' of it in another deed is a 'defeasance'; but it must contain proper words to defeat or put an end to the deed of which it is intended to be a defeasance, as that it shall be void or of no force or effect." Lippincott v. Tilton, 14 N. J. Law (2 J. S. Green) 361, 364 (citing Lacey v. Kynaston, 2 Salk. 557); Flagg v. Mann (U. S.) 9 Fed. Cas. 202, 222.

It has often been held that where, upon a conveyance of an estate or interest in land, there is a stipulation in the deed itself, or in a separate deed executed at the same time and constituting, with the conveyance, one transaction, that the estate shall be reconveyed upon the payment of money, such stipulation constitutes a "defeasance," as much as if the words were "on condition" or "provided, however," etc. So a conveyance for a term of years, containing an agreement that the lessee will reconvey the premises to the lessor upon the payment of a specified sum, with interest thereon, is a mortgage, and the relation of the parties is that of mortgagor and mortgagee. Nugent v. Riley, 42 Mass. (1 Metc.) 117, 119, 35 Am. Dec. 355.

Bond for reconveyance.

In Gen. St. c. 40, § 23, providing that when a deed purports to be an absolute conveyance in terms, but is made or intended to be made defeasible, by force of an instrument of defeasance, as against any person other than the maker of the defeasance, unless the instrument of defeasance is recorded, the expression "instrument of defeasance" should be construed to include a bond for a reconveyance on the payment of a specified sum and interest at a specified date, made at the same time and at the same date as the deed. Butman v. James, 27 N. W. 66, 67, 84 Minn. 547.

Date of.

"It is not necessary that the dates of the defeasance and the original deed should be alike. It is to be executed at the same time, that it may be a part of the same transaction." Harrison v. Trustees of Philip's Academy, 12 Mass. 456, 463.

Parties to.

To be valid, a defeasance must be made between the same persons who were parties to the first deed, and must be signed and executed by the person whose estate is to be defeated. Miller v. Quick, 59 S. W. 955, 956, 158 Mo. 495.

DEFEASIBLE FEE.

A "defeasible fee" is a vested remainder which might be defeated by the death of the remainderman before the time fixed for the taking effect of the devise. Forsythe v. Lansing's Ex'rs, 59 S. W. 854, 855, 109 Ky. 518.

A "defeasible fee" is where the devisee becomes invested with the fee-simple title, subject to be divested upon the happening of some contingency provided by the will, as where an estate is devised to A.; and, if A. should die without children, then to B. In such case the devise only takes effect in the event A. dies without children, and B. becomes owner in fee of the estate. Wills v. Wills, 8 S. W. 900, 902, 85 Ky. 486 (citing Hughes v. Hughes, 51 Ky. [12 B. Mon.] 115).

DEFEASIBLE TITLE.

A "defeasible title" is one that is capable of being annulled or made void, not one that is already void or an absolute nullity. Elder v. Schumacher, 18 Colo. 433, 448, 83 Pac. 175 (quoting Webster's Dict.).

DEFEAT.

"Defeat," as used in an act providing that if any defendant shall conceal himself so as to defeat any person from bringing an action against him, etc., signifies the performance of some act, which will amount to a prevention or hindrance of a suit, such as the creditor cannot with reasonable diligence overcome, and imports resistance and obstruction to his rights; and, unless the acts complained of are in point of fact such as would hinder and prevent him from bringing the suit notwithstanding his desire so to do, they cannot properly be said to "defeat" the suit. Coleman v. Walker, 60 Ky. (3 Metc.) 65, 68, 77 Am. Dec. 163; Walker v. Sayers, 68 Ky. (5 Bush) 579, 581.

Gen. St. tit. 1, § 390, providing that no dam shall be erected to the injury of any mill site on the same stream on which a mill-dam has been lawfully erected, unless the right to maintain such mill "shall have been lost or defeated by abandonment or otherwise," did not mean a material loss of the right to use such mill site, inasmuch as a party has absolute dominion over his own property, subject only to the right of eminent domain, and could not therefore literally lose the right to maintain the mill; but the words meant only such a neglect to use it as showed that the owner had no intention of improving it again for milling purposes. Curtiss v. Smith, 35 Conn. 156, 158.

DEFEATED PARTY.

"Defeated party," as used in Bankr. Act 1867, § 8, providing that no appeal shall be allowed in any case from the district to the circuit court unless it is claimed and notice given thereof to the assignee or to the defeated party in equity, means the opposite, adverse, or successful party. "The defeated party in equity is generally the one who takes the appeal, and does not therefore require notice, but must give it. The purpose of the act, the remainder of the section in which the word is used, and the impossibility of any other reasonable meaning, requires this construction." Wood v. Bailey, 88 U. S. (21 Wall.) 640, 642, 22 L. Ed. 689.

DEFECT.

See "Formal Defect"; "Latent Defect"; "Mental Defect."
Any defect, see "Any."

A defect is a fault—the want or absence of something necessary for completion or perfection. Haney-Campbell Co. v. Preston Creamery Ass'n, 98 N. W. 297, 300, 119 Iowa 188.

As used in reference to a street, a defect is a lack of reasonable safety. Peake v. City of Superior, 82 N. W. 306, 308, 106 Wis. 403.

"A want or absence of something necessary for completeness or perfection." Webst. Dict. It also includes the idea of a fault or want of perfection. In the statutory sense, a street or sidewalk is defective when it is nor in a reasonably safe condition for the use for which it was intended. Bliven v. City of Sioux City, 52 N. W. 246, 85 Iowa, 346.

Code, § 2590, which provides that an employer is liable for any injury to his employes caused by a "defect in the condition of the ways," means any inherent defect in the ways or machinery of the employer which would render their use unsafe to the employes—such as, for instance, neglect to have the outer rail on a curve on a railroad track sufficiently raised above the inner rail to make passage at the ordinary rate of speed safe, or allowing a switch to exist in a track after its use had been discontinued, or any other defect or want of repair of the track or way which would tend to make passage over it dangerous. Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. v. Webb, 11 South. 888, 889, 97 Ala. 157.

Where machinery was perfect of its kind, and in good repair, but unsuitable for the purpose for which it was used, it was a "defect," within St. 1887, c. 270, § 1, cl. 1, providing that employers shall be liable for defects, etc. Gelonek v. Dean Steam Pump Co., 43 N. E. 85, 89, 165 Mass. 202.

Code, § 1749, art. 1, which provides that the employer is liable for personal injury to the servant when the injury is caused by reason of any defect in the condition of the ways, works, machinery, or plant connected with or used in the business of the master or employer, means some inherent condition, of a permanent or quasi permanent nature, of the ways, works, machinery, or plant, which unfits the thing for its uses; some weakness of construction with reference to the proposed uses, as where the ordinary appliances for drawing buckets of water from a well are used to lower and hoist men; some inadaptation to its purposes, as where the sides of a coke lift are not sufficiently fenced to safely hoist its burden (citing Heske v. Samuelson, 12 Q. B. Div. 30); some break or misplacement of the parts, or the absence of some part; some innate, abnormal quality of the thing which renders its use dangerous, as the viciousness of a horse constituting "plant" in the business of a wharfinger (citing Yarmouth v. France, 19 Q. B. Div. 647); some obstacle in the way of use or obstruction to use which is a part of the thing itself, or of the condition of the thing itself, as holes in or ice upon a way, or the like. Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. v. Burton, 12 South. 88, 91, 92, 97 Ala. 240.

In cross-walk.

A small ridge of ice on a cross-walk, formed by the trampling of snow and freezing and melting until the surface is uneven, is not a defect in the cross-walk rendering the city liable for injuries received. McKel- lar v. City of Detroit, 23 N. W. 621, 623, 57 Mich. 158, 58 Am. Rep. 357.

In highway.

Sp. Laws 1881, p. 412, c. 73, § 8, providing that no action shall be maintained against the city of Mankato on account of any injuries received by means of any "defect in the condition of any bridge, street, sidewalk or thoroughfare," unless commenced within one year from the happening of the injury, nor unless notice of the injury has been given, should be construed as referring to defects in such public ways or structures as such, and with reference to their usefulness and safety for the purpose of travel. It has reference to injuries caused by dangerous conditions of that kind, and does not embrace injuries resulting to adjacent property from conditions which do not render the street or highway defective as such. Pye v. City of Mankato, 38 N. W. 621, 622, 38 Minn. 536.

Obstructions necessarily erected on highways in order to repair them are not, in any proper sense, "defects." They are the necessary means to a lawful end—means necessary to the pursuance of a duty imposed by law—and, when reasonable notice of their existence is given, create no liabilities on the part of towns for injuries occasioned by them. Lane v. City of Lewiston, 39 Atl. 999, 1000, 91 Me. 292 (citing Morton v. Inhabitants of Frankfort, 55 Me. 46).

In Gen. St. c. 44, §§ 1, 22, providing that any person who receives an injury from a defect or want of repair in a highway may recover damages therefor from the town or city by law obliged to repair the same, if such town or city had reasonable notice of the defect, or the defect had existed for 24 hours previous to the occurrence of the injury, "defects" should be construed to mean all defects, and is not limited to open and visible defects. Burt v. City of Boston, 122 Mass. 223, 226.

Within Laws 1881, c. 700, which imposes a liability on towns for certain damages caused by reason of defective highways or bridges in such towns, includes anything which makes the highway unsafe for public travel, and hence would include awnings over a sidewalk, an advertising banner suspended over a street, a pile of ashes in the street, a pile of stones on the side of the roadway, or a wagon truck left in the highway overnight without being lighted or guarded. Whitney v. Town of Ticonderoga, 6 N. Y. Supp. 844, 845, 53 Hun, 214.

Objects within the limits of a highway calculated to frighten horses of ordinary gentleness are defects. Dimock v. Town of Suffield, 30 Conn. 129.

Whatever incumbers a highway so as to make it dangerous to public travel is a defect, and, if injury results therefrom, liability will attach to any party whose duty it was to remove it. Eggleston v. Columbia Turnpike Road (N. Y.) 18 Hun, 146, 148. And this is so though the object causing the fright of the horse be on the margin of a road—entirely out of the traveled track. Winship v. Enfield, 42 N. H. 197. If a pile of stones has a tendency to frighten horses, and is of a dangerous character, though not technically an obstruction in a highway or a defect, the town will be liable for damages caused to travelers thereby after notice of its character, and neglect to remove the same. Eggleston v. Columbia Turnpike Road, 82 N. Y. 278, 281, affirming 18 Hun, 146, 148.

If there is a dangerous place, such as a declivity or excavation, so close to a street, or the traveled part thereof, as to render it unsafe for travel in the absence of a railing or barrier, the wanting of such railing or barrier constitutes a defect in the highway itself, for injuries from which the municipality is liable. City of San Antonio v. Porter, 59 S. W. 922, 924, 24 Tex. Civ. App. 444 (quoting Dill. Mun. Corp. [4th Ed.] § 1017); Palmer v. Inhabitants of Andover, 56 Mass. (2 Cush.) 600, 606; Davis v. Hill, 41 N. H. 329, 334; Jones v. Inhabitants of Waltham, 58 Mass. (4 Cush.) 299, 301, 50 Am. Dec. 783.

A permanent wooden awning, covering the sidewalk of a street, and resting on posts so insecurely supported as to be dangerous to persons using the street, is a defect for which the city is liable. Hune v. City of New York, 74 N. Y. 264, 273.

Where limits of a highway are not connected by any visible object, and there is nothing to show a person in the evening that the course a traveler is pursuing is not within the public way, the town is liable for an injury to a traveler within the general course of travel, though beyond the limits of the located way, when he drove into a cellar. Hayden v. Inhabitants of Attleborough, 73 Mass. (7 Gray) 338, 339.

Where a portion of a bridge had been carried away by a freshet, and had been condemned, and a fence built across the highway to turn the travel from it, it constituted a defect, where the bar was not so continued as to effectually warn the public. Thorp v. Town of Brookfield, 36 Conn. 320.

A post standing without the limits of a highway, but near the line thereof, and in the general direction of the travel thereon, held a defect. Cogswell v. Inhabitants of Lexington, 58 Mass. (4 Cush.) 307.

Where a road is so constructed as to present two paths, both of which seem safe, and one leads to a dangerous precipice, while the other is quite safe, and there is no notice, it constitutes a defect. Ireland v. Os- wego, H. & S. Plankroad Co., 13 N. Y. (3 Kern.) 526.

Rev. St. c. 25, § 22, relating to injuries from any defect or want of repair in any highway, would not include an injury sustained by the falling of snow and ice from a roof which projected over the highway. It would only extend to injuries received by reason of defects in the surface of the highway, or in the railings which are necessary to guard the same, and injuries arising from like causes. Hixon v. City of Lowell, 79 Mass. (13 Gray) 59, 64.

In railroad.

In the employers' liability act (St. 1887, c. 270, § 1, cl. 1), making employers liable for injuries to their employés by reason of any defect in the condition of the ways of the employer's business, due to the negligence of the employer, defect cannot be construed to include an awning maintained by a railroad company at a station for the protection of passengers from the rain; there being no defect in the condition of the awning itself. Fisk v. Fitchburg R. Co., 33 N. E. 510, 511, 158 Mass. 238.

In vessel.

A contract for the sale of a ship providing that the seller shall not be liable for "any defect whatever" means any defect which is consistent with its being the thing described, but does not relieve the seller from the implied warranty that the vessel is as described. Per Pollock, C. B., in Taylor v. Bullen, 5 Exch. 779, 785.

DEFECT OF FORM.

See "Defect of Substance."

DEFECT OF PARTIES.

A defect of parties, as a ground of demurrer, does not reach a case where there are too many plaintiffs or too many defendants, but only those cases in which, from the statement of the cause of action, it appears that there are parties omitted who should have been made parties plaintiff or defendant. Palmer v. Davis, 28 N. Y. 242, 245; Tew v. Wolfsohn, 76 N. Y. Supp. 919, 921, 38 Misc. Rep. 54; Id., 79 N. Y. Supp. 286, 287, 77 App. Div. 454; Palmer v. Davis, 28 N. Y. 242, 245; Potter v. Ellice, 48 N. Y. 321, 325; Lowry v. Jackson, 3 S. E. 473, 475, 27 S. C. 318; Boldt v. Budwig, 28 N. W. 280, 281, 19 Neb. 739; Powers v. Bumeratz, 12 Ohio St. 273, 287; Berkshire v. Shultz, 25 Ind. 523, 526; Mornan v. Carrol, 35 Iowa, 22, 24; Truesdell v. Rhodes, 26 Wis. 215, 220; Pomeroy, Rem. § 287; Neil v. Trustees of Ohio Agricultural & Mechanical College, 31 Ohio St. 15, 20.

"A defect of parties to an action" means the absence of one or more of the necessary parties, and not merely the absence of proper parties. Beach v. Spokane Ranch & Water Co., 85 Pac. 111, 112, 25 Mont. 379.

"A defect of parties is founded on the notion or fact that there are other persons interested in the controversy who should be brought before the court, and whom the court will order to be brought in where the objection is taken in time." Weatherby v. Meiklejohn, 20 N. W. 374, 375, 61 Wis. 37.

The phrase "defect of parties" does not include joinder of an improper party. Great Western Compound Co. v. Aetna Ins. Co., 40 Wis. 373; Palmer v. Davis, 28 N. Y. 242, 245.

The mere joinder of too many persons as defendants, when there is no misjoinder of subjects, is not a ground of demurrer by any one of them against whom the complaint sets forth a good cause of suit. A demurrer may be interposed for the defect of parties, but not for the reason merely that too many are brought in. New York & N. H. R. Co. v. Schuyler, 17 N. Y. 592, 604.

DEFECT OF SUBSTANCE.

Cr. Proc. Act, § 53, enacting that every objection to any indictment for any defect of substance apparent on the face thereof must be taken by a demurrer before the jury shall be sworn, means defect in any matter that is essential to be set forth to show that an offense has been committed. State v. Startup, 39 N. J. Law (10 Vroom) 423, 432.

Under the statute permitting the amendment of an affidavit for attachment in relation to a defect of form, amendments for defects of substance cannot be made. The matters of substance in such an affidavit are the existence of a debt, its amount, and that it is justly due and owing, and a statutory cause for the issue of the writ, with the negation of purpose to vex or harass the defendant. All else is matter of form. Flexner v. Dickerson, 65 Ala. 129, 132.

DEFECTIVE.

See "Title Defective in Form."
Otherwise defective, see "Otherwise."

DEFECTIVE ATTACHMENT AFFIDAVIT.

Within the meaning of Code, § 2464, providing that, where an attachment affidavit is defective, plaintiff shall be allowed to file a new affidavit, which shall be as valid as if given at the commencement of a suit, includes a case where an affidavit for attachment states the debt due, and the declaration is for a debt due in part only. Daleheimer v. McDaniel, 12 South. 333, 69 Miss. 339.

DEFECTIVE HIGHWAY.

Defects of Highway, see, also, "Defect."

A highway which is so constituted that travelers will be likely to be allured from it into dangerous paths is defective. Munson v. Town of Derby, 87 Conn. 298, 310, 9 Am. Rep. 332.

In order to constitute a public road a defective highway, within the meaning of Gen. St. 1889, p. 7134, giving a right of action against counties and townships in favor of persons who, without contributory negligence, sustained damages by reason of defective highways, it is not necessary that it shall first be improved and put in condition for travel, and then allowed to become defective through lack of repair. A laid-out and opened road is none the less a public highway because not yet put in condition for travel. Reading Tp. v. Telfer, 48 Pac. 134, 136, 57 Kan. 793, 57 Am. St. Rep. 355.

A statute making a town liable for injury to any persons by reason of a defective road did not mean everything rendering the highway unsafe or defective, nor on the other hand apply to the roadbed only; but any object in, on, or near the traveled path which would necessarily obstruct or hinder one in the use of the road for the purpose of traveling thereon, or which, from its nature and position, would be likely to produce that result, would generally constitute a defect. Hewison v. City of New Haven, 34 Conn. 186, 142, 91 Am. Dec. 713.

"Defective highways," as used in Laws 1881, c. 700, which imposes a liability on a town for certain damages caused by reason of defective highways or bridges in such town in cases in which the commissioner or commissioners of highways of said town are now by law liable therefor, means highways actually unsafe for public travel. Whitney v. Town of Ticonderoga, 6 N. Y. Supp. 844, 845, 53 Hun. 214.

Laws 1881, c. 700, § 1, providing that the several towns in the state shall be liable to any person suffering the same for all damages to person or property by reason of defective highways or bridges in such towns, has reference to their condition for public travel upon them, which their designation as highways imports, and in view of the purpose for which they are established and maintained; and the impairment of a highway for public use may be no less such by an obstruction placed in it than by a physical disturbance or injury to the bed of the roadway. In either case the highway is in a defective condition, and such condition is within the meaning of the term "defective highways." Whitney v. Town of Ticonderoga, 27 N. H. 403, 127 N. Y. 40.

In an action for death caused by the condition of a road, it was held that a submission to the jury as to whether the highway was "defective and unsafe" was not erroneous, the court saying that such expression is substantially equivalent to the expression "insufficient" or "out of repair," as used in the statute authorizing a recovery for damages caused by the insufficiency or want of repairs of any bridge or road. Carpenter v. Town of Rolling, 88 N. W. 953, 956, 107 Wis. 559.

DEFECTIVE MACHINERY.

It is held that, under a statute providing that exemption of risk shall not be an offense in a servant's action against an employer for injuries resulting from defective machinery, an injury caused by the fact that a machine was not securely fastened to the floor is not an injury arising from defective machinery. Empire Laundry Machinery Co. v. Brady, 60 Ill. App. 379.

DEFECTIVE RECOGNIZANCE.

"Defective," as applied to a recognizance, though different somewhat in significance from "insufficient," is frequently used indifferently with such latter word by the Legislature as meaning the same thing; and, as to a recognizance, there can scarcely be said to be any distinction in fact. State v. Lavalley, 9 Mo. 834, 836.

DEFECTIVE ROADBED OR WAY.

In an action against a railroad company for the death of one of its locomotive engineers, caused by an obstruction on the track, the court, in the first sentence of an instruction, told the jury that, if defendant employed the deceased as an engineer, it assumed a duty to him to construct and maintain its roadbed and roadway in a reasonably safe condition. In the latter part of the instruction the court stated that if the jury believed that the plaintiff's intestate was, without any fault or negligence on his part, killed in the manner charged in the complaint, and that the death was caused by the defective condition of defendant's roadbed or roadway, and such condition was known, or might have been, by the defendant, the jury should find for the plaintiff. Held that by the use of the words "defective condition of defendant's roadbed or roadway" was meant and intended a condition of the roadbed or roadway not reasonably safe. Little Rock & Ft. S. Ry. Co. v. Voss (Ark.) 18 S. W. 172, 178.

The term "defective way," in the employer's liability act, in reference to the liability of a railroad for an injury resulting from a defective way, does not include a movable object, such as a car on a side track placed temporarily in a dangerous proximity to a railroad track. Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. v. Burton, 12 South. 88, 90, 97 Ala. 240.

DEFECTIVE SIDEWALK.

"Defective," as used in a municipal charter (Pub. & Loc. Laws, 1869, c. 293, § 9), rendering the owner of premises liable for damages sustained by reason of a defective sidewalk, means "defective because of imperfection or fault in the materials of which it is made, or from defect or fault in constructing it, or it may become defective and dangerous from use or in consequence of things placed upon it." Morton v. Smith, 4 N. W. 330, 333, 48 Wis. 265, 33 Am. Rep. 811.

DEFECTIVE TITLE.

The term "defective title," as used in describing title to land, means that the party claiming to own has not the whole title, but some other person has title to a part or portion of the land. Copertini v. Oppermann, 18 Pac. 253, 258, 76 Cal. 181.

A defective title is understood to be, and is in contemplation of law, the same as no title whatever, and a party exercising an office or franchise of a public nature is considered as a mere usurper unless he has a good and complete title in every respect. Thus the term, when used in speaking of a defective title of a person acting as president of a corporation in relation to his right to such office, means that he has no title thereto. Place v. People, 61 N. E. 354, 356, 192 Ill. 160.

Of affidavit.

Code, § 406, provides that it shall not be necessary to entitle an affidavit in an action, but an affidavit made without a title, or with a defective title, shall be as valid and effectual for every purpose as if it were duly entitled, if it intelligently refers to the action or proceeding to which it is made. To give effect to the intention of the Legislature, the words "defective title" must be understood in their broadest sense; that is, as equally applying whether the title be inaccurate as merely incomplete, or is positively erroneous. Bowman v. Sheldon, 7 N. Y. Super. Ct. (5 Sandf.) 657, 659, 10 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 339, 340.

DEFEND.

The term "defend," as used in the treaty between the United States and the kingdom of Italy, providing that consuls general may have recourse to the authorities of the respective countries within their respective districts, whether federal or local, judicial or executive, in order to defend the rights and interests of their countrymen, is to be given the broadest meaning, and includes the power to maintain affirmatively the rights of the consul's countrymen, so that a consul has authority to receive the distributive shares to which persons residing in his country are entitled from the estate of a person dying in the United States. In re Tartaglio's Estate, 33 N. Y. Supp. 1121, 1122, 12 Misc. Rep. 245.

To defend is to contest and endeavor to defeat a claim or demand made against one in a court of justice. And its use in the statute providing that boards of directors of irrigation districts may sue, appear, and defend in person or by attorneys, and in the name of such district, implies that the district may be sued, as well as sue. Boehmer v. Big Rock Irr. Dist., 48 Pac. 908, 911, 117 Cal. 19.

DEFENDANT.

See "Material Defendant."

Any defendant, see "Any."

Other defendants, see "Other."

"Defendant," as the term was used in the courts of common law, originally meant a person who was sued in a court of law, and who attempted to resist such suit. Brower v. Nellis, 33 N. E. 672, 673, 6 Ind. App. 323.

When a person was sued at law, the purpose of the action was to obtain a judgment affecting his rights of person or property. He who attempted to defend against such an action was a defendant. Jewett Car Co. v. Kirkpatrick Const. Co. (U. S.) 107 Fed. 622, 624.

Gen. St. p. 419, § 19, relating to the process of foreign attachment, and directing a continuance or adjournment if the defendant is not in the state, was intended to apply to and mean a defendant residing out of the state, and not to include an inhabitant of the state temporarily absent. Potter v. Sanborn, 49 Conn. 452.

The term "defendants," in a record entry showing "prayer of defendants attorney" for an appeal, may be taken in the possessive case singular, and held to apply only to a surviving defendant. Where one of two defendants is dead, the term can only apply to the survivor. Grove v. Swartz, 45 Md. 227, 228.

The title "defendant" is more generally applied to a party in a civil than in a criminal suit or proceeding. Tyler v. State, 21 Atl. 611, 63 Vt. 300.

A decree vesting title to a certain lot in the complainant, and declaring the defendants to be forever barred, without naming such defendants, should be held to comprise all those who are made parties as such to the suit. Dousman v. Hooe, 3 Wis. 466, 494.

In Mansf. Dig. §§ 3909, 5159, providing that a defendant constructively summoned, who did not appear, may at any time within two years move to have the action retried, the term "defendant" is used in a limited sense, as meaning one who is a party to an action against him in the style of the suit, whether it looks to a personal judgment or not. McLain v. Duncan, 20 S. W. 597, 599, 57 Ark. 49.

In a suit to foreclose a chattel mortgage which purported on its face to have been executed by defendant mortgagor, but where there were several defendants, a paragraph of a complaint alleging that complainant had such mortgage recorded in C. county, where defendant lived, did not amount to an allegation that it was recorded where the mortgagor lived. Stengel v. Boyce, 42 N. E. 905, 906, 143 Ind. 642.

A statement in the record that a cognovit actionem signed in the partnership name by one of the partners was proved to be executed by the defendants will be construed to mean that all the partners who were served with process assented to and authorized the execution of the instrument. Hull v. Garner, 31 Miss. 145.

Where one of several defendants filed a plea in abatement, a judgment quashing a declaration, and using the term "defendants" in the final order that defendants have execution, must be construed as referring only to the defendant that filed the plea in abatement. Barnes v. Michigan Air Line R. Co., 54 Mich. 243, 245, 20 N. W. 36.

As answering defendant.

A statement in the record that, on the trial, counsel appeared for the defendants, will be presumed to mean for all the defendants who have answered. Adamson v. Sunby, 53 N. W. 761, 762, 51 Minn. 460.

Claimant in liquor forfeiture proceeding.

St. 1864, c. 121, § 1, providing that in all criminal prosecutions in which the defendant relies for his justification on any license, appointment, or authority, he shall prove the same, and until such proof the presumption shall be that he is not so authorized, should be construed to include the claimant who becomes a party to a proceeding for the forfeiture of intoxicating liquors illegally kept and intended for sale, who is a party to answer the charges in the complaint, and defend himself and his property against such charges. He has the same rights as to the rules of evidence and mode of trial and of appeal as other defendants in criminal cases. Commonwealth v. Certain Intoxicating Liquors, 122 Mass. 8, 11.

As claimant or respondent.

The term "defendants" in the Supreme Court rules in admiralty is used indifferently to represent the respondents in a suit in personam, or claimants who defend a suit in rem. Atlantic Mut. Ins. Co. v. Alexandre (U. S.) 16 Fed. 279, 281.

Corporation.

A statute authorizing the attachment of the goods of defendant, etc., includes a corporation as well as natural persons, as a corporation may be made a defendant equally with natural persons. South Carolina R. Co. v. McDonald, 5 Ga. 531, 535.

As defendant in court.

Where the judgment is against the defendants, the word "defendants" will be construed and regarded to mean the defendants who appeared or were served. Neal v. Singleton, 26 Ark. 491, 494.

"Defendant," as used in a verdict rendered by a jury against the defendant, means the defendant in court, and does not include a defendant not served with process, and not having appeared. Storey v. Kerr, 89 N. W. 601, 603, 2 Neb. (Unof.) 568.

A motion to discontinue, purporting to be made by the defendants, prima facie means the defendants served with process. Pollard v. Huston, 75 Tenn. (7 Lea) 689, 690.

The word "defendants," as used in the statement of a justice as follows, "Judgment against the defendants for" $100.35, means those persons only on whom process had been served, and who were before the court, and does not embrace a party defendant who was not served with process, and who did not appear before the court. Winchester v. Beardin, 29 Tenn. (10 Humph.) 247, 251, 51 Am. Dec. 702.

As each defendant.

Comp. Laws 1879, p. 755, § 198, declaring that the defendant in every indictment or information shall be entitled to a peremptory challenge, means each defendant, where two or more are jointly charged in one information, and put on trial together. State v. Durein, 29 Kan. 688, 690.

Act Cong. March 3, 1863, § 5, provides that if a suit is commenced against any person for any arrest or imprisonment for wrongs done during the Rebellion by virtue or under color of any authority derived from the government, and the defendant shall at the time of entering his appearance file a petition stating the facts, verified by affidavit, the cause may be removed to the next Circuit Court of the United States in the district. The word "defendant" is to be understood in its distributive or personal sense, and not in its collective or party meaning, so that each party has the right alone to remove his cause. Tod v. Fairfield County Court of Common Pleas, 15 Ohio St. 377, 383.

Effect of filing counterclaim.

A nonresident plaintiff suing in the state court, against whom a counterclaim is brought, is a defendant, within the provisions of the act authorizing the removal of causes from state to federal courts, which limit the right of removal to the defendant who is a citizen of another state than that in which the suit is brought, for a counterclaim creates a controversy in which the original plaintiff occupies the attitude of a defendant. This is in reality a cross-action, which often involves an inquiry into transactions wholly distinct from those which furnish the basis of the original suit, and for such cross-action a judgment may be rendered against the original plaintiff to any amount. Carson & Rand Lumber Co. v. Holtzclaw (U. S.) 39 Fed. 578, 580; Walcott v. Watson (U. S.) 46 Fed. 529, 530.

Technically, no doubt, the defendants who file a cross-complaint are plaintiffs therein; but even then there is no impropriety in designating them as defendants, in order to distinguish them from the plaintiff in the original complaint. It is as defendants they file their cross-complaint, and, if they were not defendants, they could not file any such pleading. Lentz v. Martin, 75 Ind. 228, 234.

Garnishee.

A statute authorizing the granting of an injunction when during the litigation it appears that the defendant in the action is doing or threatening to do some act in violation of the plaintiff's rights should be construed to include a garnishee, for, the proceedings against a garnishee being to all intents an action, such garnishee is a defendant in the action. Malley v. Altman, 14 Wis. 22, 25; Almy v. Platt, 16 Wis. 169, 173.

As judgment or execution debtor.

The word "defendant," as used in the act in relation to attachments issued out of justices' courts, shall be construed to mean the judgment or execution debtor. Mills' Ann. St. Colo. 1891, § 2745.

The word "defendant" in Gen. St. c. 211, § 14, means defendant in execution. Ex parte Thayer, 11 R. I. 160, 161.

The word "defendant" in Gen. St. c. 146, § 38, providing that, after the rendition of judgment in a civil action, if the execution has not been satisfied, the court or justice, upon the petition of the defendant, may order a stay or supersedeas of it, if the petitioner gives to the adverse party security for the prosecution of the review, refers to the party against whom the judgment sought to be reversed is rendered, and not to the defendant in the original action. Leavitt v. Lyons, 118 Mass. 470.

Municipal corporation or state.

Act Jan. 29, 1827 (Rev. Laws 1833, p. 145), authorized process in certain cases to issue against defendants residing in foreign countries. Held, that the word "defendant," as used in such a statute, applied to persons only, and, in the absence of specific mention, states, counties, and municipal corporations are not included therein. Schuyler County v. Mercer County, 9 Ill. (4 Gilman) 20, 24.

Under Pub. St. c. 206, § 12, providing that a writ of attachment may be issued on an affidavit alleging that plaintiff has a claim against "defendant," etc., and the statute of construction (Id. c. 24, § 3), providing that the singular number shall include the plural, and vice versa, the word "defendant" in an affidavit for attachment will be construed to include parties defendant. McMahon v. Perkins, 46 Atl. 405, 22 R. I. 116.

The word "defendant," used in a judgment, has been decided to be a collective word, which may embrace, and should be understood to embrace, all the defendants who, as the record showed, might and should be embraced in the judgment. Clagget v. Blanchard, 88 Ky. (8 Dana) 41, 43.

As party defendant.

By the term "defendant," as used in the title relating to execution, is meant the party against whom judgment was rendered. Rev. St. Tex. 1895, art. 2334.

As party prosecuted.

The party prosecuted in a criminal action is designated as the defendant. Comp. Laws N. M. 1897, § 1045; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 7748; Code Cr. Proc. N. Y. 1903, §§ 7, 950; St. Okl. 1903, § 5154.

The word "accused" is intended to refer to any person who in a legal manner is held to answer for any offense at any stage of the proceeding, or against whom complaint in a lawful manner is made, charging the commission of an offense, including all proceedings from the order for arrest to the final execution of the law; and the word "defendant" is used in the same sense. Pen. Code Tex. 1895, art. 25.

As real party.

A defendant, within the meaning of Act Cong. Feb. 10, 1855, providing for two judicial districts in Ohio, and that suits should be brought in the districts where the defendant resides, but that if there should be more than one defendant, and they should reside in different districts, the plaintiff might sue in either, is one who is a real, and not merely a nominal, party to the suit, and who has either directly or indirectly an interest adverse to the claim of the plaintiff, and may be in some way affected by the judgment or decree to be entered. Consequently, where, in an action by stockholders of a bank charging malfeasance and fraud in the directors of the institution, and seeking to make them individually liable to the stockholders, stockholders not alleged to have had any participation in the acts, and against whom no decree was asked, could not be named as defendants, so as to give the district court of the district in which they reside jurisdiction of the cause. Sackett's Harbor Bank v. Barry (U. S.) 21 Fed. Cas. 133, 134.

Code, § 60, which provides that every action, other than certain ones named, must be brought in the county in which the defendant or some of the defendants reside, or may be summoned, means not nominal defendants, merely, but parties who have a real and substantial interest adverse to the plaintiff, and against whom substantial relief is sought. It means an actual defendant—one having an actual interest in the result of the suit, adverse to the plaintiff—and does not include a surety who has been discharged by an act of the plaintiff from liability on the instrument sued on. Dunn v. Haines, 23 N. W. 501, 17 Neb. 560.

Code, tit. 4, § 53, after enumerating certain actions, provides that every other action must be brought in the county in which the defendant, or some one of the defendants, reside. Section 58 provides that, where the action is rightfully brought in any county according to the provisions of title 4, a summons shall be issued to any other county against any one or more of the defendants at the plaintiff's request. Held to mean not the nominal defendants, merely, but parties who have a real and substantial interest adverse to the plaintiff, and against whom substantial relief is sought. Allen v. Miller, 11 Ohio St. 374, 378.

Surety.

The term "defendant," as used in Code, §§ 3103, 3128, relating to the right of a defendant to redeem from foreclosure, means the principal debtor, or person in whom is the legal, or possibly an equitable, title in and to the premises sought to be redeemed, and does not include a surety on a promissory note secured by the mortgage. Miller v. Ayres, 13 N. W. 436, 438, 59 Iowa, 424.

Vendee of execution defendant in foreclosure.

Under Code, § 3123, relating to redemption of lands, and providing that the rights of a defendant in relation to redemption are transferable, the vendee of an execution defendant is within the meaning of the term "defendant." Robertson v. Moline, Milburn & Stoddard Co., 55 N. W. 495, 496, 88 Iowa, 463.

Code, § 3102, relating to redemption of mortgaged premises, provides that the defendant may redeem real property within one year from the day of sale, and will in the meantime be entitled to the possession of the property. But in no action where the defendant has taken an appeal or stayed execution shall he be entitled to redeem. Held, that the term "defendant," in the first sentence, means the person holding the right to the possession as the owner of the land, which would include the vendee of the execution defendant. The person referred to and described as the defendant in the last sentence is the party to the suit, and does not include the vendee of the execution defendant. Thayer v. Coldren, 10 N. W. 800, 801, 57 Iowa, 110.

DEFENDANT COMES NOT.

See "Comes Not."

DEFENDANT'S CASE.

An order for the examination of a plaintiff, limiting the proposed examination to such subjects as might be material to the defendant's case, means the contributory negligence alleged in the answer, and sought to be established by the proposed examination. Kelly v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co., 19 N. W. 521, 523, 60 Wis. 480.

DEFENDANT'S COSTS.

"Defendant's costs," as used in a judgment in favor of plaintiff, reciting that the defendant's costs were a certain amount, means the costs which the defendant was to pay; the judgment being rendered for one bill of costs only. The costs that were adjudged against the defendant were not the costs which he had himself expended, but costs of the plaintiff. Gulick v. Van Arsdalen, 3 N. J. Law (2 Penning) 746, 747.

DEFENDANT'S RIGHTS.

The Code of Criminal Procedure, directing the reversal of a judgment of conviction if the jury was charged on the weight of the evidence, though such charge be not excepted to, if it was calculated to injure the rights of the defendant, means "a right to an acquittal unless his guilt be established by competent evidence beyond a reasonable doubt; second, to have the law applicable to the evidence given in charge to the jury; and, third, to have the judge refrain from charging on the weight of the evidence and discussing the same." Maddox v. State, 12 Tex. App. 429.

DEFENSE.

See "Affirmative Defense"; "Consistent Defenses"; "Equitable Defenses"; "Lawful Defense"; "Meritorious Defense"; "Partial Defense"; "Personal Defense."

Issuable defense, see "Issuable."

In law, defense is that which is offered and alleged by the party proceeded against in an action or suit as a reason, in law or fact, why the plaintiff should not recover or establish what he seeks—what is put forward to defeat an action. And it has also been defined as the denial of the truth or the validity of the complaint—a general assertion that the plaintiff has no ground of action. Whitfield v. Aetna Life Ins. Co. (U. S.) 125 Fed. 269, 270.

A defense, in legal language, is a full answer to the whole or to some part of plaintiff's demand. Wehle v. Butler (N. Y.) 43 How. Prac. 5, 15, 12 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 189, 148.

Defenses are of two classes: First, those which deny some material allegations on the part of the plaintiff; and, second, those which confess and avoid those allegations. Donovan v. Main, 77 N. Y. Supp. 229, 233, 74 App. Div. 44.

In Const. art. 9, § 15, providing that knowledge by an employé of defects in machinery shall be no defense to an action for injury caused thereby, etc., the word "defense" is not used in its technical sense. The words "shall be no defense to an action" are to be understood as meaning "shall not defeat an action." The Constitution did not intend to deal with pleadings, but with a principle of law. Youngblood v. South Carolina & G. R. Co., 38 S. E. 232, 60 S. C. 9, 85 Am. St. Rep. 824. The object of the provision was to take from a defendant that failed to furnish suitable machinery the right to defeat an action by the employé by showing that he did not act with due care in voluntarily operating the machinery after knowledge of its defective condition. Bodie v. Charleston & W. C. Ry. Co., 44 S. E. 943, 948, 66 S. C. 302.

"Defense," as used in a statute providing that no appeal shall be granted to remove a judgment rendered upon the verdict of a jury unless the party demanding the appeal shall file with his bond an affidavit, made by himself, stating that he believes he has a just, legal defense, is not to be construed as meaning merely an opposition or denial of the truth or validity of a complaint, so as to deny an appeal to a plaintiff, but as meaning matter which is a just and legal protection or guard against the judgment which has been rendered. Miller v. Martin, 8 N. J. Law (3 Holst.) 201, 204.

"The word 'defense' applies to every matter tending to diminish or entirely defeat the plaintiff's cause of action." Baler v. Humpall, 20 N. W. 108, 16 Neb. 127.

The phrase "sufficient to constitute a cause of action" as used in Rev. St. 1881, § 346, is not equivalent to the phrase "does not state facts sufficient to bar the plaintiff's action"; and hence a demurrer using the latter clause to state the ground therefor is insufficient. Angaletos v. Meridian Nat. Bank of Indianapolis, 31 N. E. 368, 4 Ind. App. 573.

As cause of defense.

In a demurrer alleging that an answer does not state sufficient to constitute a defense to the plaintiff's action, the word "defense" sufficiently presents the question whether the answer states a cause of defense, within the statute providing that, when the facts stated are not sufficient to state a cause of defense, the plaintiff may demur. Lewellen v. Crane, 15 N. E. 515, 517, 113 Ind. 289.

Counterclaim distinguished.

A counterclaim is not a defense, as the word is used in reference to pleadings. Thus, in section 500 of the Code of Civil Procedure it is provided that an answer may contain a statement of new matter constituting a defense or counterclaim, thus making a clear distinction between the two; and the definition of "counterclaim" as given in section 501 shows that it is not included in the term "defense." Hence a counterclaim cannot be stricken off as sham under a provision allowing a sham answer or defense to be stricken off on motion. Baum's Castorine Co. v. Thomas, 37 N. Y. Supp. 913, 92 Hun, 1.

A counterclaim cannot be stricken out as an irrelevant defense. It is not a defense. It is an affirmation of a cause of action against the plaintiff in the nature of a cross-action, upon which the defendant may have an affirmative judgment against the plaintiff. Fettretch v. McKay, 47 N. Y. 426, 427, 11 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 453, 454.

A clear distinction between a defense and a counterclaim is that, when a defense is intended as a counterclaim, it should be explicitly so stated in the answer; and when the defendant defines his answer as a defense, and it is uncertain whether a counterclaim is intended, the answer should be construed and considered as his defense. Lafond v. Lassere, 56 N. Y. Supp. 459, 26 Misc. Rep. 77.

A defense denies the right to recover, and shows that plaintiff never had a cause of action, or that it has been discharged as by payment; but a counterclaim does not deny the cause of action, or plaintiff's right to recover thereon. A counterclaim will not prevent plaintiff from obtaining full credit for the amount due him, yet, if established, it affects his right of judgment. Yarger v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 43 N. W. 469, 78 Iowa, 650.

Conclusion of law.

A defense is a statement of new matter, viz., matter outside of the general issue sufficient to divide the balance cause of action. Code Civ. Proc. § 500. A statement of a conclusion of law does not constitute a defense. Hicks v. New Jersey Car Spring & Rubber Co., 49 N. Y. Supp. 401, 22 Misc. Rep. 585.

Demurrer.

A demurrer is a defense, within Code Civ. Proc. § 3253, providing that in a difficult and extraordinary case, where a defense has been interposed, the court may award a further sum, etc. Vietor v. Halstead, 14 N. Y. Supp. 516, 517, 60 Hun, 578.

When a person was sued at law, the purpose of the action was to obtain a judgment affecting his rights of person or property. He who attempted to defend against such action was called a "defendant," and the means employed to defend against such action were called his "defense." Originally the word "defense," as used in the common-law court, meant simply the denial of the truth of the declaration. Later it came to mean whatever was offered by the defendant as sufficient to defeat the cause of action stated in the declaration, offered by way of denial, justification, or confession and avoidance. He could defend by demurrer or by pleading matter of fact. Jewett Car Co. v. Kirkpatrick Const. Co. (U. S.) 107 Fed. 622, 624.

"Defense," as the term was used in the courts of common law, meant the means used by a defendant to defeat the suit of his adversary. "Originally the word 'defense,' as used in common-law courts, meant simply a denial of the truth of the declaration or complaint, but now it means that which is offered by a defendant as sufficient to defeat the complaint, by denying, justifying, or confessing and avoiding the action. The person sued could defend by demurrer or by interposing the matter of fact." Brower v. Nellis, 33 N. E. 672, 673, 6 Ind. App. 323.

Denial.

Strictly speaking, the word "defense" signifies an opposing or denial of the truth or validity of the complaint. Stewart v. Travis (N. Y.) 10 How. Prac. 148, 151 (citing 3 Bl. 290).

A defense, in law, is the denial of the truth or validity of the complaint. In other words, it is the denial of the truth of the complaint, or an admission of the truth, and a dispute of the continued existence, of the claim, by a plea of payment or discharge, and by way of mitigating the amount of the recovery by alleging facts in recoupment. Cohn v. Hussen (N. Y.) 66 How. Prac. 150, 151.

Code Civ. Proc. § 500, provides that the answer of the defendant must contain (1) a general or specific denial of each material allegation of the complaint controverted by the defendant, or of any knowledge or information thereof sufficient to form a belief; (2) a statement of any new matter constituting a defense or counterclaim in ordinary and concise language, without repetition. Under this section, it is held that a denial is not a defense. A defense may consist only of new matter, viz., matter outside the issue raised by a general or special denial. A denial is not a defense, and is mere surplusage not to be regarded. A defense may only contain new matter, viz., matter outside of the issue raised by a general or special denial. Green v. Brown, 49 N. Y. Supp. 163.

164, 22 Misc. Rep. 279; Staten Island Midland R. Co. v. Hinchcliffe, 70 N. Y. Supp. 601, 604, 34 Misc. Rep. 624; Flack v. O'Brien, 43 N. Y. Supp. 854, 855, 19 Misc. Rep. 399; Meurer v. Brinkman, 53 N. Y. Supp. 770, 25 Misc. Rep. 12; Johnson v. Andrews, 68 N. Y. Supp. 764, 765, 34 Misc. Rep. 80; Durst v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co., 67 N. Y. Supp. 297, 298, 33 Misc. Rep. 124; Von Hagen v. Waterbury Mfg. Co., 49 N. Y. Supp. 465, 22 Misc. Rep. 580; McManus v. Western Assur. Co., 48 N. Y. Supp. 820, 825, 22 Misc. Rep. 269; Galbraith v. Dally, 74 N. Y. Supp. 837, 839, 37 Misc. Rep. 156; Laurie v. Duer, 61 N. Y. Supp. 930, 30 Misc. Rep. 154; Tum Suden v. Jurgens, 66 N. Y. Supp. 452, 453, 32 Misc. Rep. 660; Cruikshank v. Press Pub. Co., 65 N. Y. Supp. 678, 680, 684, 32 Misc. Rep. 152; Pascekwitz v. Richards, 75 N. Y. Supp. 291, 293, 37 Misc. Rep. 250; Carter v. Eighth Ward Bank, 67 N. Y. Supp. 300, 303, 33 Misc. Rep. 128; Burkert v. Bennett, 71 N. Y. Supp. 144, 145, 35 Misc. Rep. 318.

A defense, in pleading, can only consist of matter which cannot be proved under a denial, and which, taking every allegation of the complaint to be true, nevertheless defeats the action. A defense is confession and avoidance. It is on the basis that, confessing the complaint to be true, the matter pleaded as a defense nevertheless avoids or defeats it. Sanford v. Rhoads, 80 N. Y. Supp. 404, 405, 39 Misc. Rep. 548. New matter is matter which is not embraced within the issues raised or which can be raised by denial; that is, it is matter which cannot be proved under a denial. A denial is not what is termed a "defense" in pleading, and never was. It is a confusion of ideas to call a denial a defense, when using the terminology of pleading. A denial only raises an issue on the complaint, whereas a defense consists of new matter which is a defense to the action, though the complaint be true. The sufficiency of a defense is tested by whether the new matter pleaded under it constitutes a defense to the action, taking all of the allegations of the complaint to be true. If it does not stand this test, it is demurrable for insufficiency. If there be anything in a defense which is not new matter, it is of no weight there whatever." Staten Island Midland R. Co. v. Hinchcliffe, 68 N. Y. Supp. 556, 557, 34 Misc. Rep. 49.

A defense, in pleading, is not a denial. It can be good at all only on the theory that the complaint is true in all of its allegations. That is the test of the sufficiency of a defense. Soper v. St. Regis Paper Co., 77 N. Y. Supp. 896, 898, 38 Misc. Rep. 294.

"Defense," as the term is used in law, is the means used by the parties resisting an action at law to ward off or resist the attack of the plaintiff. As the term was originally used in common-law courts, it meant simply a denial of the truth of the declaration or complaint. 3 Bl. Comm. 296; Chit. Pl. 428. But now it means that which is offered by a defendant as sufficient to defeat the complaint, by denying, justifying, or confessing and avoiding the action. The person sued could defend by demurrer or by interposing matter of fact. Steph. Pl. 82, 85. Brower v. Nellis, 33 N. E. 672, 673, 6 Ind. App. 323.

Defense is the denial of the truth or validity of the complaint, and does not merely signify a justification. It is a general assertion that the plaintiff has no ground of action, and which assertion is afterwards extended and maintained in the body of the plea. The word "defense" is a term of art. It comes from the Norman French, and was used in common-law pleading in the sense merely of "denial." Cullen v. Wolverton, 47 Atl. 626, 628, 65 N. J. Law, 279.

Equitable defense.

The phrase "the same defense," as used in Rev. St. p. 105, declaring that the nature of the defense of the obligor or maker of bonds or notes shall not be changed by assignment, but that he may make the same defense against the bond or note in the hands of the assignee that he might have made against the assignor; the defense was clearly intended to embrace equitable as well as legal defenses. The Court of Appeals of Virginia, in Norton v. Rose, 2 Wash. 233, so construed the act of the Virginia Assembly, and a similar statute in Kentucky was similarly construed, and the act held to save all equitable defenses which the obligor had against the obligee from being impaired or affected by the assignments. Barton's Adm'rs v. Rector, 7 Mo. 524, 526.

Matter in abatement.

2 Gav. & H. St. p. 283, applying to actions for the recovery of real estate, and providing that the answer shall contain a denial of each material statement or allegation in the complaint, under which denial the defendant shall be permitted to give in evidence every defense of the action which he may have, legal or equitable, includes every matter in bar of the action, whether of denial or of confession and avoidance, but not matter of abatement. The pendency of a prior action between the same parties for the same cause is no defense to a subsequent action, but is merely a reason why defendant in the subsequent action should not be compelled to make his defense therein. Wilson v. Poole, 33 Ind. 443, 449.

Mitigating circumstances.

On a demurrer to the answer in an action for libel, the question whether the circumstances which the answer alleges in mitigation of damages can be properly admitted in evidence cannot be considered, since such matter, which is pleaded only in mitigation of damages, is not a subject of demurrer at all. It is only when the new matter in the answer is alleged as a defense to the action as a legal bar, in whole or in part, to the plaintiff's recovery, that a demurrer is necessary or proper. That mitigating circumstances are not a defense, in the proper sense of the term, is evident from the fact that, if pleaded alone, the answer would be struck out as frivolous, and the plaintiff would be entitled to an immediate judgment. Newman v. Otto, 10 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 14.

Partial defense.

"Defense," as used in Code, §§ 149, 150, which require an answer to contain a statement of any new matter constituting a defense, applies to matters which go to the partial as well as to the total extinguishment of the plaintiff's claim. Foland v. Johnson (N. Y.) 16 Abb. Prac. 235, 239.

A defense to an action or a cause of action, in the popular sense of the Code, is a right possessed by the defendant, arising out of the facts alleged in his pleadings, which either partially or wholly defeats the plaintiff's claim. Thus a right given to a railroad company of exemption from taxation is clearly, if established, defensive to the claim of the people for taxes. Utah & N. Ry. Co. v. Crawford, 1 Idaho, 770, 773.

As a plea of new matter.

A defense may consist only of new matter, viz., matter outside the issue raised by a general or special denial. Green v. Brown, 49 N. Y. Supp. 163, 164, 22 Misc. Rep. 279; Staten Island Midland R. Co. v. Hinchcliffe, 70 N. Y. Supp. 601, 604, 34 Misc. Rep. 624; Flack v. O'Brien, 43 N. Y. Supp. 854, 855, 19 Misc. Rep. 399; Meurer v. Brinkman, 53 N. Y. Supp. 770, 25 Misc. Rep. 12; Johnson v. Andrews, 68 N. Y. Supp. 764, 765, 34 Misc. Rep. 89; Durst v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co., 67 N. Y. Supp. 297, 298, 33 Misc. Rep. 124; Von Hagen v. Waterbury Mfg. Co., 49 N. Y. Supp. 465, 22 Misc. Rep. 580; McMannus v. Western Assur. Co., 48 N. Y. Supp. 820, 825, 22 Misc. Rep. 269; Galbraith v. Dally, 74 N. Y. Supp. 837, 839, 37 Misc. Rep. 156; Laurie v. Duer, 61 N. Y. Supp. 930, 30 Misc. Rep. 154; Tum Suden v. Jurgens, 66 N. Y. Supp. 452, 453, 32 Misc. Rep. 660; Cruikshank v. Press Pub. Co., 65 N. Y. Supp. 678, 680, 32 Misc. Rep. 152; Pascekwitz v. Richards, 75 N. Y. Supp. 291, 293, 37 Misc. Rep. 250; Carter v. Eighth Ward Bank, 67 N. Y. Supp. 300, 303, 33 Misc. Rep. 128; Burkert v. Bennett, 71 N. Y. Supp. 144, 145, 35 Misc. Rep. 318; Strauss v. Union Cent. Life Ins. Co., 67 N. Y. Supp. 931, 932, 33 Misc. Rep. 571.

"Defense," in its legal sense, signifies not a justification, protection, or guard, but merely an opposing or denial of the truth or validity of the complaint. Gould on Pleadings says the term "defense" signifies, in the language of pleading, not a justification, but resistance or denial, as is very manifest from the established form in which defense is made. In the less technical sense, the word "defense" is used as well in legal as in popular language to signify, not the cause or form in pleading, but the subject of the plea. Thus, in an action on contract, the defendant pleads infancy; to an action of trespass, license. Infancy, in the one case, and license, in the other, is called the defense. As used in Code, § 149, subd. 2, it is not to be construed in its legal, technical sense, but is used in reference to the statement of new matter; and the new matter so pleaded need not be a complete bar to the action, in order to be properly termed a defense, but a partial payment or set-off is a defense pro tanto. Houghton v. Townsend (N. Y.) 8 How. Prac. 441, 443.

The word "defense" is a term of art. It comes from the Norman French, and was used in common-law pleading in the sense merely of "denial." Rap. & L. Law Dict.; 1 Ch. Pl. 462. Any new matter, therefore, which confesses and avoids the plaintiff's cause of action, either in whole or in part, and so far denies it, ought to be pleaded as a defense, under Code Civ. Proc. Or. § 71, confining the answer to denials and new matter, and constituting a defense or counterclaim to be pleaded as a defense. Good faith and honesty of purpose would constitute such a defense in an action for willful trespass and conversion of timber growing on plaintiff's land, in which damages were sought for the value of the timber after it had been manufactured by defendants into lumber. United States v. Ordway (U. S.) 30 Fed. 30, 32.

As question to be tried.

Some distinction was made in early cases between the term "defense" and the term "question to be tried." But under the Code, providing that two or more actions in favor of the same defendant for causes of action which may be joined may be consolidated by the court, to authorize the consolidation the defense or question to be tried must be substantially the same in all the suits. There is no distinction between the terms "defense" and "question to be tried." Perkins v. Merchants' Lithographing Co., 47 N. Y. Supp. 712, 713, 21 Misc. Rep. 516.

Set-off.

Set-off is a mode of defense by which the existence of a demand sued upon is in a certain sense admitted, but at the same time the defendant sets up a demand against the plaintiff to counterbalance it in whole or in part. Merchants' Bank v. Schulenberg, 54 Mich. 49, 51, 19 N. W. 741.

"Set-off" is a mode of defense essentially not a part connected with the remedy, and hence set-off is not governed by the law of the forum. Gallipolis Bank v. Trimble, 45 Ky. (6 B. Mon.) 599, 601.

Set-off is a defense which goes not to the justice of plaintiff's demand, but sets up a demand against the plaintiff to counterbalance it in whole or in part. Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 3745.

A set-off is but a defense to the action, and its office is to make an appropriation of money which the plaintiff owes the defendant to the discharge, in whole or in part, of the demand asserted in the suit. It can go no further than to defeat the action. It differs from a counterclaim only in the disposition made of the excess—if there be an excess—of the counterclaim over the sum due the plaintiff, and in allowing the defendant to have judgment for such excess. They are essentially alike in respect to the rules of pleading which are applicable to them. Boyet v. Vaughan, 79 N. C. 528, 531, 532.

The word "defense," as used in the statute relating to foreclosure of mechanics' liens, providing that the defendants shall have any defense the builder might have to any action on the contract, does not include a set-off. In strictness, set-off is not a defense at all, since it neither destroys the plaintiff's right of action, nor denies that the amount claimed is due. On the contrary, it passes these defenses for the purpose of exhibiting a cause of action against the plaintiff. This is not a defense. It is an adjustment. Naylor v. Smith, 44 Atl. 649, 650, 63 N. J. Law, 596.

DEFIANCE.

By "defiance" as applied to possession is meant, of course, a possession unequivocally adverse. Williams v. McGee (S. C.) 1 Mills, Const. 85, 92.

DEFICIENCY.

See "Casual Deficiency."
Any deficiency, see "Any."

A "deficiency" is defined to be the "lack of a part." In re Village of Plattsburgh, 50 N. Y. Supp. 356, 361, 27 App. Div. 353 (citing Worcest. Dict.).

"Deficiency," as used in the last clause of a will saying, "whether deficiency or surplusage, let it apply in either case pro rata to all according to the sum bequeathed," applies only to the personality which would come into the hands of the executors in performance of the ordinary duty of administering the estate. Bragaw v. Bolles, 25 Atl. 947, 950, 51 N. J. Eq. (6 Dick.) 84.

In a contract whereby the obligors bound themselves that if on the foreclosure of a mortgage a deficiency should occur they would pay the same, the word "deficiency" had a technical meaning, and signified that part of the debt or sum of money which the mortgage was made to secure, and which was not realized and collected from the subject mortgaged, and which is chargeable, under the practice of our courts, in the form of a judgment against the debtor. Goldsmith v. Brown (N. Y.) 85 Barb. 484, 492.

In cargo.

A bill of lading stipulating that any damage or deficiency in cargo will be deducted from the balance of freight by the consignee refers to the cargo actually received, and not the cargo described in the bill of lading. Merrick v. Nineteen Thousand Five Hundred and Fourteen Bushels of Wheat (U. S.) 3 Fed. 340, 341.

A bill of lading providing that any deficiency in quantity will be deducted from the balance of freight due the captain means deficiency from the quantity referred to in the bill of lading. Meyer v. Peck, 28 N. Y. 590, 596.

DEFICIT.

In a stipulation between the parties to a suit against the sureties on the official bond of a treasurer of a corporation, that between certain dates the deficit amounted to a certain sum, "deficit" means the excess of collections over disbursements as shown by the books of the corporation. The term "deficit" does not necessarily or ordinarily imply misapplication. Worcester gives its meaning as "want, deficiency in an account or a number"; Johnson gives its meaning as "want, deficiency"; and Webster defines it as "want, deficiency; as a deficit in the tax or revenue." Mutual Loan & Building Ass'n v. Price, 19 Fla. 127, 135.

DEFILE.

Code 1873, § 3862, defines forcible "defilement" as taking any woman unlawfully and against her will, and by force and menace or duress compelling her to be "defiled"; and "to defile" here means "to pollute"; "to corrupt the chastity of"; "to debauch" or "to violate." "Violate" and "force" are synonymous with "ravish." State v. Montgomery, 45 N. W. 292, 293, 79 Iowa, 737 (citing Webst. Dict.).

One of the definitions of the word "defile" given by Webster is "to corrupt the chastity of; to debauch; to violate." Absolute purity or cleanliness is not the basis of defilement in any of these definitions. That which is already impure or unclean may be defiled by making more impure or unclean. A prosecution for defilement will lie though previous chastity cannot be shown. State v. Fernald, 55 N. W. 534, 535, 88 Iowa, 553.

DEFINE.

See "To be Defined."

Under the constitutional provision that Congress shall "define" and punish piracy, a reference to the law of nations by Congress for a definition of the crime is an exercise of the power, as Congress may as well define by using a term of a known and determinate meaning as by an express enumeration of all the particulars included in that term. United States v. Smith, 18 U. S. (5 Wheat.) 153, 160.

"Define," as used in the title of an act "to define the county line of E. county," was used in its enlarged and not restricted sense, and the word would permit the abandonment of an uncertain boundary line, and change it altogether. Numerous acts are passed by every legislature "defining" the jurisdiction of courts, "defining" the power of authorities, or "defining" boundary lines, and in all these cases the powers may be either enlarged or restricted. Walters v. Richardson, 20 S. W. 279, 280, 93 Ky. 374.

"Define," as used in the title to an act to "define" the judicial districts of the state, is broad, comprehensive, and general enough to include the formation of a new judicial district; for the word "define" is not used exclusively in the sense of making clear what was before unintelligible, ambiguous, or uncertain, though it has such a meaning, and then relates to something that had a prior existence. In re Board of Com'rs of Johnson County, 32 Pac. 850, 851, 4 Wyo. 133.

As contract or bound.

The word "defined," as used in stating the legal proposition that subterranean waters can only be the subject of riparian rights when flowing in "defined" or known channels, means a contracted and bounded channel, though the course of the stream may be undefined by human knowledge. Miller v. Black Rock Springs Imp. Co., 40 S. E. 27, 30, 99 Va. 747, 86 Am. St. Rep. 924; City of Los Angeles v. Pomeroy, 57 Pac. 585, 598, 124 Cal. 597.

Underground currents of water, which flow in channels, the course of which can be distinctly traced, are "defined" and known, within the meaning of the law, and governed by the same rules of law as streams flowing beneath the surface. Meando Ditch Co. v. Adams, 68 Pac. 431, 434, 29 Colo. 317.

The word "defined," as used in the phrase "defined channel," as applied to a subterranean stream of water, means a contracted and bounded channel. It is not meant that there must be a channel or fissure in the rock through which the water flows freely and rapidly, in order that there may be a defined subterranean stream, but simply that the water, whether moving slowly or rapidly, or passing through sand or gravel or porous rock, must have the characteristics of a stream, in that it has a course, and a channel with definite bounds. Huber v. Merkel, 117 Wis. 355, 94 N. W. 354, 355, 62 L. R. A. 589.

As enlarge or extend.

The word "define" may be, and frequently is, used in the sense of merely to make clear and certain what was before uncertain, ambiguous, or indefinite; but in legislation it is frequently used in the creation, enlarging, and extending the powers and duties of boards and officers, in defining certain offenses and providing punishment, and thus enlarging and extending the scope of the law, and it has this meaning when applied to the title of an act to define boundaries of a city. People v. Bradley, 36 Mich. 447, 452.

As fix or establish.

According to the best lexicographers, "to define" means to determine the end or limit, as to define the extent of the kingdom or country, and by defining is meant determining the limits. For instance, towns are authorized to determine the number and define the limits of school districts within the same. There can be no doubt but "to define the limits" here means to determine, to fix, or establish the limits. Gould v. Hutchins, 10 Me. (1 Fairf.) 145, 154.

To define is to fix, establish, or prescribe authoritatively; so that a law which leaves to the voters of a municipal corporation to fix, establish, or prescribe the powers of the municipality does not define such powers, as required by the Constitution. Boyd Paving & Contracting Co. v. Ward (U. S.) 85 Fed. 27, 35, 28 C. C. A. 667.

A "power to define" is different from a power to grant or apportion; and, however far the meaning of the word "define" might be extended when the context clearly calls for extension, it is certain that when used with reference to a jurisdiction substantially described its meaning must be confined to fixing limits for the exercise of such jurisdiction, and cannot be extended to an alteration of its character. Styles v. Tyler, 30 Atl. 163, 172, 64 Conn. 432.

As specify or designate.

The act of 1876 provided for submitting the question to the people of the several election districts of the county whether or not spirituous liquors should be sold therein, and required the result of the election in such districts to be certified, and returned to the judges of the circuit court of the county, and, if it appeared that either one or more election districts of the county had cast a majority of votes against the sale of liquors, then the judges should make a proclamation of the result of such election, defining therein the district or districts, or whole county, as the case might be. Held, that "defining" should be construed as synonymous with "specifying" or "designating," and thus simply requiring the judges to particularize in the proclamation the district or districts casting a majority of votes in favor of the law, and not as requiring the judges after the election to make any new definition of the limits or boundaries of the election districts voting for the adoption of the law. Higgins v. State, 1 Atl. 876, 64 Md. 419.

DEFINITE.

The statute requiring the filing of a succinct and definite statement of a claim against an estate is sufficiently complied with if the statement apprises the administrator or executor of the nature of the claim and the amount demanded, and shows enough to bar another action for the same demand. Hyatt v. Bonham, 49 N. E. 361, 362, 19 Ind. App. 256; Woods v. Matlock, 48 N. E. 384, 385, 19 Ind. App. 364.

DEFINITE CHARITY.

Charities are definite where they describe their object in general terms indicative of the particular kind of good to be effected thereby, though the particular objects may be indefinite. Jones v. Habersham (U. S.) 13 Fed. Cas. 957, 967.

DEFINITE FAILURE OF ISSUE.

Failure of issue is definite or indefinite. When the precise time for the failure of issue is fixed by the will, as in the case of a devise to Peter, but if he dies without issue living at the time of his death then to another, this is a failure of issue definite. An indefinite failure of issue is the very converse or opposite of this. It signifies a certain failure of issue whenever it may happen, without fixing any time, or a certain or definite period within which it may happen. Bouv. Law Dict. A devise of an estate for life, with remainder over, if the devisee dies without living issue, does not convey by implication any estate in remainder to such devisee; simply the remainder over is upon a definite failure of issue. Woodlief v. Duckwall, 19 Ohio Cir. Ct. R. 564, 566, 10 O. C. D. 686, 687.

A definite failure of issue is when a precise time is fixed for the failure of issue, as in the case where there is a devise to one, but, if he dies without issue or lawful issue living at the time of his death, then over. Cain v. Robertson, 61 N. E. 26, 27, 27 Ind. App. 198; Huxford v. Milligan, 50 Ind. 542, 546; Moody v. Walker, 3 Ark. (3 Pike) 147, 198; Hall v. Chaffee, 14 N. H. 215, 220; Anderson v. Jackson (N. Y.) 16 Johns. 382, 399, 8 Am. Dec. 330; Downing v. Wherrin, 19 N. H. 984, 49 Am. Dec. 139; Vaughan v.

Dickes, 20 Pa. (8 Harris) 509, 513. See, also, Deihl v. King (Pa.) 6 Serg. & R. 29, 32, 9 Am. Dec. 407.

DEFINITE LOCATION.

A definite location of a right of way may be made by the actual construction of the road, though a profile map of the road has never been filed. Jamestown & N. R. Co. v. Jones, 20 Sup. Ct. 568, 570, 177 U. S. 123, 44 L. Ed. 698.

DEFINITE PERIOD.

The words "definite period" in a contract of a ball player, authorizing his punishment for certain misconduct by reducing his pay for a definite period, means a period fixed by days or weeks or months. Russell v. National Exhibition Co., 69 N. Y. Supp. 732, 735, 60 App. Div. 40.

Act 1840, providing that a married woman may cause her husband's life to be insured for her use "for any definite period," and that the insurance shall be payable to her in case of her surviving him, means an insurance for a limited period. Brunner v. Cohn, 86 N. Y. 11, 16, 40 Am. Rep. 503.

DEFINITE QUANTITY.

In a specification of a patent, declaring that it relates to the recovery of precious metals from their solution by the use of a definite quantity of finely divided precipitating reagent in a state of agitation, the term "definite quantity" should not be limited in its meaning only to the amount of zinc dust necessary to properly precipitate the minerals, but may mean the certain amount needed in either case to properly produce the result, as distinguished from an indefinite or unlimited amount as was used in the older process. De Lamar v. De Lamar Min. Co. (U. S.) 110 Fed. 538, 542.

DEFINITELY FIX.

A line of railroad is not "definitely fixed," within the meaning of an act granting lands on either side of such line to aid in its construction, so as to determine the exterior limits of the grant, and prevent the lands from being granted to or earned by another company, until it has been definitely located on the ground, and such location approved by the action of the company, so that it cannot thereafter be changed at its option, and a map of such location filed with the government in the usual and proper manner. The line of railroad must have ceased to be the subject of change at the mere volition of the railroad. Southern Pac. R. Co. v. United States (U. S.) 109 Fed. 913, 922, 48 O. C. A. 712; United States v. Southern Pac. R. Co., Id.; Kansas Pac. R. Co. v. Dunmeyer, 5 Sup.

Ct. 566, 573, 113 U. S. 629, 28 L. Ed. 1122; Walden v. Knevals, 5 Sup. Ct. 898, 899, 114 U. S. 373, 29 L. Ed. 167; United States v. McLaughlin (U. S.) 80 Fed. 147, 148; Smith v. Northern Pac. R. Co. (U. S.) 58 Fed. 513, 515, 7 C. C. A. 897; Van Wyck v. Knevals, 1 Sup. Ct. 836, 837, 106 U. S. 360, 27 L. Ed. 201.

To "definitely fix" a line of railroad route, it is necessary that there shall be a survey and marking upon the ground as a fact notorious and easily observed. Southern Pac. R. Co. v. United States (U. S.) 69 Fed. 47, 54, 16 C. C. A. 114.

United States Land Grant Act March 3, 1857, providing that in case it should appear that the United States have, when the line or route of said road is "definitely fixed," sold any section or any part thereof, granted as aforesaid, so that the right of redemption is attached to the same, etc., refers to the time when the road is definitely located by a proper survey. St. Paul & S. C. R. Co. v. Ward, 49 N. W. 401, 403, 47 Minn. 40.

DEFINITELY LOCATE.

To "definitely locate" a line of railroad route it is necessary that there shall be a survey and marking upon the ground as a fact notorious and easily observed. Southern Pac. R. Co. v. United States (U. S.) 69 Fed. 47, 54, 16 C. C. A. 114.

DEFINITION.

Legal definitions are for the most part inductive generalizations derived from juridical experience, and, in order to be complete and adequate, they must sum up the results of all that experience, as they are to be found in the special cases that belong to the class to be defined. Mickle's Adm'r v. Miles (Pa.) 1 Grant, Cas. 320, 328.

"Definition," says Webster, is an explanation of the signification of a word, or of what a word is understood to express. Taylor v. Palmer, 31 Cal. 666, 687.

"Definitions differ in their character according to the nature of the thing to be defined. Words denoting real substances existing in nature, or any of the ordinary acts of the mind, are all to be explained and defined by stating the facts and circumstances that usually accompany or follow such things or acts. The word is made intelligible only by a description; by the enumeration of the attributes or circumstances in which it agrees or differs with other things of qualities somewhat similar. Thus, a name conveying an idea generalized from many individuals is defined and explained by describing the qualities ordinarily found in such individuals. It is so in the definitions of natural objects, which are rather descriptions than definitions. It is often so in the definition of moral actions. It is never so as to words or phrases denoting any artificial and purely technical conceptions; ideas framed by the mind itself and not otherwise found in nature. Such words or ideas are susceptible of a strict definition. In the logical phrase, they are capable of an essential definition comprehending the whole meaning essential to the thing being what it is; and this for the obvious reason that the meaning of the word is man's own meaning, being the creation of his own mind, and he can state precisely all that is essential to it. It is otherwise of the works of God, which man can describe only as far as known to him. Every such definition must be but a description of qualities, and that necessarily imperfect, since every work of the Creator possesses innumerable qualities which no human description or definition can grasp. Strict and essential definitions can generally be given of the terms of positive jurisprudence, and particularly so in the extremely technical and artificial system of the ancient English law. This is remarkably the case, for instance, in regard to our common-law terms of real estate, as 'fee,' 'lease,' 'warranty,' 'grant,' 'covenant,' 'reversion,' 'remainder,' etc., all of which are defined precisely and essentially, not explained by mere attributes. Bodies corporate belong to that system." Warner v. Beers (N. Y.) 23 Wend. 103, 141.

The definition of a crime is an enumeration of the particular acts which are included by or under the name of such crimes. Marvin v. State, 19 Ind. 181, 184.

DEFINITIVE.

That which finally and completely ends and settles a controversy. Black, Law Dict.

A "definitive or certain sum of money," within the meaning of a statute imposing a duty on bonds given as security for the payment of a definitive or certain sum of money, not exceeding, etc., means the principal of the bond, to be ascertained from the bond itself, and does not include interest thereon. Barker v. Smark, 7 Mees. & W. 590, 592.

DEFINITIVE DECREE OR SENTENCE

The term "definitive sentence or decree," as used in Act March 29, 1832 (P. L. 213), providing that any person aggrieved by a definitive sentence or decree of the orphans' court may appeal to the Supreme Court, is synonymous with "final decree," and means the final result. "In one sense every decision or order of the court during the progress of a case may be called final. That particular step may not be retraced. Yet in law they are intermediate, or interlocutory, not final or definitive. A writ of error nor an appeal will not lie at each stage of the proceeding." An order awarding an inquest of partition is not a definitive sentence or decree, it being not necessarily more than the first step toward a valuation or appraisal, having none of the characteristics of a decree or sale, disturbing no right, settling no title, and authorizing no sale. Appeal of Gesell, 84 Pa. 238, 239.

Act March 27, 1713, § 9, authorizing an appeal from a "definitive sentence" or judgment passed by the orphans' court, should be construed to include an order of the orphans' court directing a sale of real estate for the payment of debts, it being an order condemning the property without any further hearing to be had on the subject, except to carry it fairly into execution. Appeal of Hess (Pa.) 1 Watts, 255, 257.

DEFORCE—DEFORCEMENT.

The word "deforce" implies that the plaintiff had been in possession; but this word signifieth, says Lord Coke, to withhold lands or tenements from the rightful owner. Phelps v. Baldwin, 17 Conn. 209, 212 (citing Co. Litt. 381b).

"Deforcement" is a term of most general signification, and includes the holding of any lands or tenements of which another has right. In a declaration of dower it is unnecessary to aver either the seisin or possession of the husband or the deforcement of the demandant, and possession of the land by defendant, these being matters of defense which may be the subject of special pleas. Foxworth v. White's Ex'r (S. C.) 5 Strob. 113, 115.

A deforcement is a wrongful withholding of lands from the rightful owner; in case of dower, a denial of the widow's rights. Woodruff v. Brown, 17 N. J. Law (2 Har.) 246, 269.

A deforcement of a widow's dower is the withholding of the dower by the heir or alienee. Hopper v. Hopper, 21 N. J. Law 543 (1 Zab.) 547 (citing 3 Bl. Comm. 172).

DEFRAUD.

The term "defraud" means to deprive of right, either by obtaining something by deception or artifice, or by taking something wrongfully, without the knowledge or consent of the owner. People v. Wiman, 42 N. E. 408, 409, 148 N. Y. 29.

"To defraud is to withhold from another that which is justly due to him, or to deprive him of a right by deception or artifice." Burdick v. Post (N. Y.) 12 Barb. 168, 186.

"Defraud" is defined by the Encyclopedia Dictionary as meaning "to deprive of a right, by withholding from another, by indirection or device, that which he has a right to claim or obtain." Deseret Nat. Bank v. Kidman, 71 Pac. 873, 877, 25 Utah, 379, 95 Am. St. Rep. 866.

Walker explains the term "defraud" by the approximate terms signifying "to rob, to deprive, to cheat." State v. Rickey, 9 N. J. Law (4 Halst.) 293, 302.

The words "cheating" and "defrauding," of themselves, do not import an offense, and do not define an offense, unless effected by false tokens or pretenses. Pursuant to this construction of the words, it is held that an indictment for conspiracy to cheat and defraud must set out the false tokens and pretenses to be used in effecting the contemplated fraud. Alderman v. People, 4 Mich. 414, 424, 9 Am. Dec. 321.

In Rev. St. § 5440 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3676], punishing persons who conspire to defraud the United States in any manner, the word "defraud" not only signifies pecuniary fraud, but has the broad meaning of depriving another of a right by deception and artifice, so as to include a conspiracy by which one falsely impersonates another at a civil service examination, and makes a declaration sheet for the latter. United States v. Curley (U. S.) 122 Fed. 738, 740.

Rev. St. § 5440 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3676], declares that if two or more persons conspire to defraud the United States in any manner or for any purpose, and one or more of such parties do any act to effect the object of the conspiracy, all shall be liable to a penalty prescribed. Held, that the crime provided by such act was sui generis, consisting of two elements: A conspiracy, and an act done to effect or accomplish it. The purpose of the conspiracy must be either to commit a crime defined by any law of the United States, or to defraud the United States, and the doing of some act to carry such purpose into effect. To "defraud the United States in any manner or for any purpose" is a very comprehensive expression, and includes every conspiracy to deprive the United States, by misrepresentation or concealment of material facts, of any kind of property, or whatever might be legally due to it on account of taxes, duties, imports, excises, etc. United States v. Owen (U. S.) 32 Fed. 534, 537.

A statute providing that any contractor or subcontractor who shall purchase his materials on credit and represent at the time of such purchase that the same are to be used in a designated building or other improvement, and shall thereafter use or cause to be used the said materials in the construction of any building or improvement other than that designated, with intent to defraud the person from whom the materials were purchased, without first giving notice to such person, shall be guilty, etc., means with intent to deprive the materialman of the lien on which he relied at the time of making the sales. Simmons v. Carrier, 60 Mo. 581, 585.

The phrase "intent to defraud" finds an excellent interpretation in Chaffe v. Gill, 43 La. Ann. 1054, 10 South. 361, in which we held that, as the property of the debtor is the common pledge of his creditors, every act done by the debtor with the intent of depriving his creditor of the eventual right he has upon the property of such debtor is illegal. Standard Cotton Seed Oil Co. v. Mathe-son, 20 South. 713, 720, 48 La. Ann. 1321.

As actually defraud.

A statute providing that when any insolvent debtor has fraudulently concealed or fraudulently incumbered or disposed of any of his property with intent to cheat and defraud his creditors, the judge may direct the distribution of the debtor's property among his creditors on their filing releases, or without their filing releases, in his discretion, means to actually defraud, as distinguished from fraud in law. To bring a case within the statute, the act complained of must have been committed with the actual, corrupt, and dishonest design or purpose of cheating and defrauding. Shotwell v. Niccollet Nat. Bank, 45 N. W. 842, 843, 43 Minn. 389.

If the words "fraud," "defraud," "fraudulent," and "fraudulently," in the chapter relating to insolvency proceedings, Pub. St. c. 2020, §§ 27, 34, 37, 40, and 49, relate to actual fraud alone, it would be difficult to explain why the Legislature in another section of the same chapter used the word "fraudulent" to include fraud in law. If that had been the legislators' purpose, some equivocal indications of this would be expected. Thompson v. Esty, 45 Atl. 566, 571, 69 N. H. 55.

The word "defraud," as used in Rev. St. § 5480, as amended March 2, 1889 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3696], punishing the sending of letters through the mail with intent to defraud, is used in its broad sense, and includes any artifice, trick, or scheme by which a man is induced to part with his money, either voluntarily, in hope of seeming benefit, or involuntarily through fear. It includes the scheme to defraud persons of their money by means of letters sent through the mail threatening to accuse the person of crime and disgraceful matters, which threats were not to be carried out if the money was paid as the price of silence. United States v. Horman (U. S.) 118 Fed. 780, 781.

Advantage and damage implied.

The word "defraud" in Rev. St. § 5209 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3497], making it criminal for any officer, clerk, or agent to make any false entry in any book, report, or statement to the association with intent to defraud or injure the association, etc., necessarily implies that advantage comes to the party defrauding, and corresponding damage to the party who is defrauded; but the word "injure" has no such application. It is used in designating an injury which may come to the party whose property is taken, without any reference to whether the party who converts is benefited or not. United States v. Lee (U. S.) 12 Fed. 816, 819.

"Defraud," as used in a criminal statute making an intent to defraud an ingredient of a crime, does not mean merely an intent to deprive one of personal property, but has a broader meaning, and extends to acts prejudicing the rights of another in any way. State v. Boasso, 38 La. Ann. 202, 206.

Artifice or deception implied.

While it is true that "defraud" generally implies artifice or deception, one may be defrauded of his property when he has been wrongfully deprived thereof. To deprive of something dishonestly is to defraud. It is not uncommon to speak of one as "defrauded" of his rights who has been wrongfully deprived of them by other means than trickery. The reward justly due one for services may be withheld, and in that sense he is "defrauded." To "defraud" implies or includes all acts, omissions, or concealments which involve a breach of legal or equitable duty, trust, or confidence generally imposed, and which are injurious to another, or by which an undue advantage is taken of another, so that under the statute making it a criminal offense to use the mails in any scheme or artifice to defraud, a plan to extort money from another by threatening to publish charges against him, accusing him of having committed crimes, unless the sum demanded is paid, is a scheme to defraud. Horman v. United States (U. S.) 116 Fed. 350, 354, 53 C. C. A. 570.

Criminal intent.

The word "fraud" imports guilty knowledge, and there is no possibility that an act of fraud can be committed without a fraudulent intent, so that a definition of "defraud" as to deprive of right, either by taking something by deception or artifice, or by taking something wrongfully without the knowledge or consent of the owner, is erroneous as not requiring criminal intent. People v. Wiman, 32 N. Y. Supp. 1037, 1044, 85 Hun. 320.

Hinder or delay synonymous.

The term "hinder and delay" is regarded as synonymous with the expression to "defraud." Armstrong v. Ames, 43 S. W. 302, 305, 17 Tex. Civ. App. 46; Burdick v. Post (N. Y.) 12 Barb. 168, 186.

To "defraud" means to deprive one of some right, interest, or property by deceitful devices; to withhold from wrongfully; to cheat; and implies or includes all the acts, omissions, and concealments which involve a breach of legal or equitable duty, trust, or confidence justly reposed, and are injurious to another, or by which an undue and unconscionable advantage is taken of another. Citing Burdick v. Post (N. Y.) 12 Barb. 186; Burnham v. Brennan, 42 N. Y. Super. Ct. (10 Jones & S.) 63. So that an affidavit that the mortgage was not given to delay or "defraud" the creditors of the mortgagor sufficiently complies with the statute providing that the affidavit shall state that the mortgage was not given to "hinder or delay" the creditors. Petrovitzky v. Brigham, 47 Pac. 666, 667, 14 Utah, 472.

"Defraud," as used in the phrase, "disturb, hinder, delay, or defraud creditors," is the most generic term of the four, and really includes all the others, since to "disturb, hinder, or delay" a creditor in the collection of his debts are only different modes of "defrauding" him of his rights, and these words are used merely as more specific statements of various forms of fraud. Weber v. Mick, 23 N. E. 646, 649, 131 Ill. 520.

In the law regarding fraudulent conveyances, the words "hinder," "delay," and "defraud" are not synonymous. A conveyance may be made with intent to hinder or delay, without an intent to absolutely defraud. Either intent is sufficient. A conveyance made by an embarrassed debtor with a view, which was known to the purchaser, to secure the property from attachment, is void, though honestly made, the debtor intending that all creditors should be paid in full. The debtor's property is, in theory of law, subject to immediate process issued at the instance of his creditors, and the debtor will not be permitted to hinder or delay them by any device which leaves it, or the avails of it, subject to his control and disposition; and it makes no difference that the debtor intends to apply the avails of it to the payment of his debts. Edgell v. Smith, 40 S. E. 402, 404, 50 W. Va. 349. See, also, Crow v. Beardsley, 68 Mo. 435, 439.

DEGRAS.

The word "degras," as used in Customs Act 1897, par. 279, relating to wool grease, including that known commercially as "degras," or brown-wool grease, has had to some extent a generic meaning, and is not always limited to wool grease or its products; but, in the trade of the United States, "degras" and "brown-wool grease," found in that paragraph, have now like signification, and each is the equivalent of what is known as "wool grease." Brown grease is obtained by acidulating with mineral acids the suds from wool grease. United States v. Leonard (U. S.) 108 Fed. 42, 43, 47 C. C. A. 181.

DEGREE.

"Degree," as used in the rule that an indictment should state the defendant's degree, means his rank in life. State v. Bishop, 15 Me. 122, 124.

The degree of kindred is established by the number of generations, and each generation is called a "degree." Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 1855.

DEHERISON.

See "Disherison."

DEL CREDERE.

"Del credere" is a term of mercantile law, used to denote the agreement sometimes made by an agent or factor. He receives an additional compensation or commission, and therefore undertakes to insure to his principal the solvency of the purchaser." Loeb v. Hellman, 83 N. Y. 601, 603.

A "del credere agent" is one who undertakes to procure a particular person to deal with his principal, and, in consideration of an additional commission allowed him, guarantees the payment of all bills of goods purchased of his principal by such customer, and as such agent he is primarily liable to satisfy his principal the price of the goods sold. Lewis v. Brehme, 33 Md. 412, 424, 3 Am. Rep. 190.

A "del credere agreement" is an agreement by which "a factor, for a premium greater than is usual, becomes bound, when he sells the goods, to pay the price at all events. In Grove v. Du Bois, 1 Term R. 115, Lord Mansfield observes: 'It is an absolute agreement to the principal from the broker, and makes him liable in the first instance.' " Leverick v. Meigs (N. Y.) 1 Cow. 645, 663.

A "del credere commission" is an additional compensation allowed to a commission merchant or factor in consideration of his guarantying the payment to his principal of the debts due from the buyer for goods sold by such factor or commission merchant. Duguid v. Edwards (N. Y.) 60 Barb. 288, 296.

When a factor undertakes to guaranty to his principal the payment of the debt due by the buyer of the goods, he is said to receive a "del credere commission." Ruffner v. Hewitt, 7 W. Va. 585, 604.

DELAY.

See "Accidental Delays"; "Unnecessary Delay"; "Unreasonable Delay"; "Vexatious Delay"; "Without Delay."

"Delay," as used in a contract exempting a telegraph company from all liability for any delay, error, or remissness in sending a message, implies that the message was or would be sent at some time, but not sent or delivered promptly, and the company is not exempt from liability for a total failure to send and deliver a message. Baldwin v. United States Tel. Co. (N. Y.) 54 Barb. 505, 512, 6 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 405, 423.

The term "delay," as used in the statute making void all transfers of property made with intent to delay, hinder, or defraud creditors, is to be taken in its legal or technical sense, and not in its literal sense. For instance, where the sole purpose of a debtor is to secure his creditors, and there is no intent to either delay or defraud others, although the natural result of it may be to delay other creditors, but whenever the purpose of a conveyance is to bring about such delay, then the law itself is violated, and the contract by which his property is transferred becomes tainted with legal fraud. Monroe Mercantile Co. v. Arnold, 34 S. E. 176, 180, 108 Ga. 449.

The delay contemplated by a statute providing that a conveyance with intent to "hinder and delay" creditors shall be deemed fraudulent has in it an element of fraud, and, if the delay be found in any case to be free from such element, then it is not of that character which under the statute vitiates conveyances. No creditor without a lien has the right to have the debt due him paid out of any particular property of the debtor. All creditors have the same right to have their debts paid out of the property of the debtor, unless by a contract with the debtor, or by legal process, one or more acquire a right to be paid out of the proceeds of some particular property, or to have some particular thing, by way of sale, in satisfaction of his or their debt. Every payment of a debt by a person unable to pay all his debts, whether the payment be made in money or property, tends, in a popular sense, to hinder or "delay," or it may be even to defeat, other creditors in the collection of their debts, the extent of the effect depending on the amount of indebtedness and the value of the debtor's property; but it has never been held that a payment, either with money or property, by an insolvent debtor, in the absence of a law declaring preferences invalid, was, within the meaning of the law, to hinder, "delay," or defraud other creditors. Ellis v. Valentine, 65 Tex. 532, 547.

Discrimination.

Rev. St. art. 4574, subd. 2, declares that every railroad company failing or refusing to receive or transport the tonnage and cars of any connecting line without delay or discrimination, as prescribed by the regulations of the railroad commission, shall be deemed guilty of unjust discrimination; and article 4575 imposes a penalty on any company guilty of discrimination. Held, that the terms "delay" and "discrimination" were to be used as convertible, and that "delay" was "discrimination" within the terms of the statute; and hence, delay in a shipment having been admitted, it was proper to direct a verdict for plaintiff. Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Lone Star Salt Co., 63 S. W. 1025, 26 Tex. Civ. App. 531.

As hinder.

See "Hinder."

DELECTUS PERSONÆ.

Every partnership is founded in a "delectus personæ," which implies confidence and knowledge of the character, skill, and ability of the other associates, and their personal co-operation, advice, and aid in the management of the business. Goodburn v. Stevens (Md.) 5 Gill, 1, 21.

DELEGATE.

See "Assembly of Delegates."

A "delegate," in its strict, literal, technical meaning, is a person sent and empowered to act for another; one deputed to represent another. Yet the Legislature, by its use in Gen. Laws 1893, c. 4, §§ 31, 33, 34, providing for nominations "by any assembly, or convention of delegates," did not intend to prohibit political parties from holding mass meetings for the nominations of candidates for office. The word in that connection should be construed in its more popular sense as being a regularly selected member of a regular party convention. Manston v. McIntosh, 60 N. W. 672, 58 Minn. 525, 23 L. R. A. 605.

DELEGATED POWER.

A "delegated power" is an authority which one person transfers to another, and which in some cases that other cannot further transfer. Crooke v. Kings County, 97 N. Y. 421, 441.

DELEGATION.

Delegation "is where a debtor obtains a release from his creditor by the substitution and acceptance of another who obliges himself to the creditor." Adams v. Power, 48 Miss. 450, 451.

DELEGATION OF POWER.

There is a distinction between a delegation of power for public and for private purposes. Where the power is delegated for a mere private purpose, all the persons, if more than one, upon whom the authority is conferred, must unite and concur in the exercise. In cases of the delegation of a public authority to three or more persons, the authority conferred may be exercised and performed by a majority of the whole. If the act to be done by virtue of such public authority requires the exercise of discretion and judgment—in other words, if it is a judicial act—the persons to whom the authority is delegated must meet and confer together, and be present when the act is performed; or, at least, a majority must meet, confer, and be present after all have been notified to attend. Where the act to be done is merely ministerial, a majority must concur and unite in the performance of the act, or they may act separately. Perry v. Tynen (N. Y.) 22 Barb. 137, 140.

DELETERIOUS.

In a statute for the preservation of fish and other game, a provision that no person shall throw or deposit any dye stuff, coal tar, refuse from gashouses, sawdust, lime, or other deleterious substance into any river, pond, or stream, the adjective "deleterious" has the effect, and such was the intention in using the same, to limit and qualify the meaning of the previous general words of the paragraph. The common and generally accepted meaning of the word is having the power of destroying or extinguishing life; that which is destructive; poisonous; pernicious; as a deleterious plant or quality. Webster. The object and purpose of this statute is declared in its title, "For the Preservation of Fish and Other Game"; and the word "deleterious" must have some meaning given to it, for it has been used by the Legislature in describing the quality of the material which is prohibited from being thrown or deposited in the streams or lakes of the state, and unless the act done, though included in the general words of the statute, has the effect in some degree of destroying fish or game, no penalty is incurred. Cartwright v. Canandaigua Gaslight Co. (N. Y.) 32 Hun, 403, 406.

DELIBERATE — DELIBERATION — DELIBERATELY.

See "Sedate Deliberate Mind."

The expression "deliberation," distinctly formed in the mind, used in the charge of a prosecution for murder, implies the absence of overpowering passion. State v. Ah Mook, 12 Nev. 369, 381.

It is a perversion of terms to apply the term "deliberate" to any act which is done under sudden impulse. Nye v. People, 35 Mich. 16, 19.

The essential element of "deliberation" in connection with homicide is that the homicide must have been committed in the furtherance of a formed design to gratify a feeling of revenge, or accomplish some other unlawful purpose. State v. Furgerson, 162 Mo. 668, 677, 63 S. W. 101 (citing State v. Wieners, 66 Mo. 13; State v. Fairlamb, 121 Mo. 137, 25 S. W. 895).

In an indictment charging murder, both the words "deliberation" and "premeditation" involve a prior purpose to do the act charged. Aubrey v. State, 35 S. W. 792, 62 Ark. 368.

"Deliberate" means to weigh in the mind; to consider the risks for and against; to consider maturely. Milton v. State, 6 Neb. 136, 143.

"Deliberately" means with careful consideration and deliberation; with full intent; not hastily or carelessly—as a "deliberately" formed purpose. Ferguson v. State, 35 S. W. 369, 370, 86 Tex. Cr. R. 60.

The words "deliberate and premeditated," as applied to murder in the statutes, are used in their natural and ordinary sense, intending to exclude from the operation of the death penalty murder committed on the impulse of the moment, without actual deliberation and premeditation, unless committed in perpetrating arson, robbery, or burglary. They were meant to distinguish between an act done with a murderous intent, with a purpose of mind to kill, and an act done upon sudden impulse, without meditation or murderous intent. State v. Greenleaf, 54 Atl. 38. 42, 71 N. H. 606 (citing State v. Carr, 53 Vt. 37).

"Deliberate" means formed with deliberation, in contradistinction to a sudden rash act. Hawes v. State, 7 South. 302, 304, 88 Ala. 37; Martin v. State, 25 South. 255, 257, 119 Ala. 1; Mitchell v. State, 60 Ala. 26, 28.

Deliberation is that act of the mind which examines and considers whether a contemplated act should or should not be done. United States v. Kie (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 781, 782.

"Deliberation," according to Webster, means the act of deliberating, or of weighing and examining the reasons for and against a choice or measure; mature reflection. Sumnerman v. State, 17 N. W. 115, 14 Neb. 568.

"With deliberation" means, not hastily or rashly, but coolly and with careful consideration. State v. Fiske, 63 Conn. 388, 390, 28 Atl. 572.

The provision that every murder committed by means of poison or lying in wait, or by any other kind of willful, "deliberate, and premeditated" killing, shall be deemed murder in the first degree, means that it is not only necessary that the accused shall plan, contrive, and scheme as to the means and manner of the commission of the deed, but that he shall consider different means of accomplishing the act. He must weigh the modes of consummation which his premeditation suggests, and determine which is the most-feasible. The word "deliberate" is derived from two Latin words, which mean literally "concerning" and "to weigh." When used as an adjective in the English, it means that the manner of the performance was determined upon after examination and reflection; that the consequence, chance, and means were weighed and carefully considered and estimated. The term "premeditated" literally means to plan, contrive, or scheme beforehand. Craft v. State, 3 Kan. 450, 481.

Pen. Code, § 1, declares that every person who purposely, but without deliberation, kills another, shall be guilty of murder in the second degree. Held, that the word "deliberation" means to weigh in the mind; to consider the reasons for and against, and consider maturely; to reflect on. State v. Rutten, 43 Pac. 30, 32, 13 Wash. 203.

"Deliberation" is the act of considering and weighing the reasons for and against a measure or act. An act to be deliberate must be done after consideration, weighing, and balancing in the mind its nature and consequences, as distinguished from an act done under sudden impulse, without thought or reflection, and without the approval of the will. Commonwealth v. Perrier (Pa.) 3 Phila. 229, 232.

As with cool, considerate purpose.

"Deliberately," as used in connection with the crime of murder, means with cool, considerate purpose. State v. Yarborough, 18 Pac. 474, 478, 39 Kan. 581.

As in a cool state of blood.

"Deliberation," when used to describe an element of crime, means in a cool state of blood, as opposed to a heated state. State v. McDaniel, 7 S. W. 634, 636, 94 Mo. 301.

"Deliberately" means in a cool state of blood, not in a heat of passion caused by some just or lawful case of provocation to passion. State v. Taylor, 71 S. W. 1005, 1008, 171 Mo. 465; State v. Harper, 149 Mo. 514, 520, 521, 51 S. W. 89, 91; State v. Talbott, 73 Mo. 347, 350; State v. Ellis, 74 Mo. 207, 220; State v. Lewis, 14 Mo. App. 191, 195; State v. Privitt, 75 S. W. 457, 459, 175 Mo. 207; State v. Donnelly, 32 S. W. 1124, 1125, 130 Mo. 642; State v. Dickson, 78 Mo. 438, 441; State v. Schaefer, 22 S. W. 447, 450, 116 Mo. 96; State v. Landgraf, 8 S. W. 237, 240, 95 Mo. 97, 6 Am. St. Rep. 26; State v. Tettaton, 60 S. W. 743, 748, 750, 159 Mo. 354; State v. Stephens, 10 S. W. 172, 175, 96 Mo. 637; State v. Seaton, 17 S. W. 169, 171, 106 Mo. 198. This definition differs from the instruction in State v. Fairlamb, 25 S. W. 895, 896, 121 Mo. 137, in that it defines the condition of the mind when the crime was committed. That is to say, the act was done in a cool state of the blood; whereas in the Fairlamb Case it was said deliberation meant a cool state of the blood, having no reference whatever to the state of the mind, but relating wholly to the physical condition of the blood. State v. David, 33 S. W. 28, 29, 131 Mo. 380. The term "deliberate" does not so much import an act done after time for reflection, as a voluntary act, an act upon motive, purpose, and design, in contradistinction to acts done in the heat of passion, where reason and choice for the moment have no power or sway. Republic v. Yamane, 12 Hawaii, 189, 203.

"Deliberation" means in a cool state of blood, and it is usually characterized by what are ordinarily termed "cold-blooded" murders, such as proceed from deep malignity of heart, and are prompted by motives of revenge or gain. State v. Spotted Hawk, 55 Pac. 1026, 1036, 22 Mont. 33; State v. Curtis, 70 Mo. 594, 599 (citing State v. Wieners, 66 Mo. 13); State v. Avery, 21 S. W. 193, 197, 113 Mo. 475.

"Deliberately" means done in cold blood, and not in a sudden passion caused by a lawful or reasonable provocation. State v. Sneed, 4 S. W. 411, 412, 91 Mo. 552.

"Deliberately" does not mean brooded over or reflected upon for a week or a day or an hour; it does not mean an intent to kill executed by a person, not under the influence of a violent passion suddenly aroused; but is chat, and that only, which is produced by what the law recognizes as a just cause of provocation, or of a lawful provocation. State v. O'Hara, 4 S. W. 422, 423, 92 Mo. 59.

An instruction on the question of murder in the first degree, that "'deliberately' means thought of beforehand; that the killing was done in a cool state of the blood"—is inaccurate. State v. Andrew, 76 Mo. 101, 105.

An instruction that "'deliberation' means the act of deliberating or weighing, and considering the reasons for and against, a choice and measure. In the sense which the word is here used, an act is done 'deliberately' or 'with deliberation' when it is done in cool blood, and not under the influence of violent passion, suddenly aroused by some real or supposed grievance. A person who does an act, not in the heat of sudden passion, but after having coolly weighed or considered the mode and means of its accomplishment, does it 'deliberately'"—is not erroneous. Debney v. State, 64 N. W. 446, 449, 45 Neb. 856, 34 L. R. A. 851.

"Deliberately," as used in an instruction in a trial for murder, means in a cool state of the blood, and that the defendant, while in that state, formed a design to kill. State v. Sharp, 71 Mo. 218, 221.

As with cruel purpose.

"Deliberately," as used with relation to homicide, means with cruel purpose. Anthony v. State, 19 Tenn. (Meigs) 265, 277, 33 Am. Dec. 143.

As with full and conscious knowledge.

"Deliberately and premeditatedly" imply a degree of reflection; that the party must have had time to frame his design, and where an act is said to be done "deliberately and premeditatedly," as in the case of a homicide, it means an intent to take a life, with a full and conscious knowledge of the purpose to do so. Jones v. Commonwealth, 75 Pa. (25 P. F. Smith) 403, 406.

As intentional.

"A 'deliberate' use of a deadly weapon is an intentional use; a use that is the result of a resolution, purpose, or design, formed in the mind and reflected on, and not done in self-defense. It is only necessary that it be the act of the mind when the mind has had time to act without heat or passion." State v. Abrams, 8 Pac. 327, 332, 11 Or. 169.

A statute providing that murder in the first degree shall be imposed only where the killing was "deliberate or premeditated," or done in the perpetration of a felony, refers to the specific intent with which the act was done, and denotes the action of the mind, and involves the idea of thought and reflection; and to constitute murder in the first degree, the jury must find a specific intent to take life. Kent v. People, 9 Pac. 852, 858, 8 Colo. 563.

The presence of a specific intent to take life is not, standing alone, conclusive that the homicidal act was done with deliberation and premeditation. State v. Bonofiglio, 52 Atl. 712, 713, 67 N. J. Law, 239, 91 Am. St. Rep. 423.

"Deliberate and premeditated," as used in a definition of first-degree murder, means "a distinctly formed intent to kill, not in self-defense, and without adequate provocation. It requires the malice prepense or aforethought of the common-law definition of murder to be, not a general malice, but a special malice that aims at the life of a person." Keenan v. Commonwealth, 44 Pa. (8 Wright) 55, 57, 84 Am. Dec. 414.

"'Murder without deliberation' means without sufficient thought to enable the person killing to form a distinct intention to kill." People v. Halliday, 17 Pac. 118, 123, 5 Utah, 467.

Mind capable of conceiving a purpose implied.

"Deliberate," within the meaning of an instruction that to constitute murder in the first degree the killing must be willful, deliberate, and premeditated, indicates the purpose formed in a mind capable of conceiving a purpose. Clifford v. State, 37 Atl. 1101, 1102, 60 N. J. Law, 287.

"By the use of the word 'deliberate' in describing a crime, the idea is conveyed that the perpetrator weighs the motives for the act and its consequences, the nature of the crime, or the things connected with his intention, with a view to a decision thereon; that he carefully considers all these, and that the act is not suddenly committed. It implies that the perpetrator must be capable of the exercise of such mental powers as are called into use by deliberation and the consideration and weighing of motives and consequences." State v. Wells, 1 N. J. Law (Coxe) 424, 427.

Premeditate synonymous.

"Deliberate," as used in a statutory definition of murder in the first degree, requiring the killing to be deliberate and premeditated, is synonymous with the term "premeditated" as there used. State v. Lopez, 15 Nev. 407, 414; State v. Reed, 23 S. W. 886, 889, 117 Mo. 604; State v. Dale, 18 S. W. 978, 108 Mo. 205; Bower v. State, 5 Mo. 364, 379, 32 Am. Dec. 325; People v. Ah Choy, 1 Idaho, 317, 319; State v. Hobbs, 17 S. E. 380, 386, 37 W. Va. 812.

The terms "malice aforethought," "deliberate design," and "premeditated design" are synonymous. Hawthorne v. State, 58 Miss. 778, 783.

The word "deliberately," as used in a definition of the offense of murder as that the act must have been done willfully, deliberately, and premeditatedly, is more comprehensive than the word "premeditatedly." "Premeditatedly" involves the idea of conception of revolving in the mind and thinking over in a passive sense, while "deliberation" carries with it the idea of planning, devising, scheming, and determining upon in the active sense, and ultimately the idea of pre-determined execution. The deliberation does not involve the idea of length of time. Any amount of deliberation will suffice if the circumstances show that there was time for reflection. That the murder was done "willfully and premeditatedly" renders the indictment insufficient. Cannon v. State, 31 S. W. 150, 153, 60 Ark. 564.

The terms "malice aforethought," "deliberation," and "premeditation" are synonymous; hence the omission of the word "deliberately," or its equivalent, in an indictment for murder in the first degree, is not fatal where the words "willfully" and "premeditatedly" are used. Cannon v. State, 32 S. W. 128, 129, 60 Ark. 564.

"Deliberation," as used in an instruction in a trial for murder, means prolonged premeditation; in other words, in law, deliberation is premeditation, in a cool state of the blood, or, where there has been heat or passion, it is premeditation continued beyond the period within which there has been time for the blood to cool in the given case. Hence

"deliberation" means more than premeditation; it is not only to think of beforehand, which may be but for an instant, but where the inclination to do the act is considered, weighed, pondered on for such a length of time after the provocation is given that there is a sufficient time for the blood to cool. One in a heat of passion may premeditate without deliberating, since deliberation can only be exercised in a cool state of the blood, while premeditation may be exercised in a heat of passion. State v. Kotovsky, 74 Mo. 247, 249.

An instruction that if a person had time to think, and did think, and, after having thought, he struck the blow as the result of a determination produced by the operation of the mind, then that would be a sufficient deliberation and premeditation, was held to be a correct definition of the adjectives "deliberate" and "premeditate." Cleveland v. State, 5 South. 428, 431, 86 Ala. 1.

"Deliberate," as used in a definition of murder in the first degree as the deliberate and premeditated killing of a person, is not synonymous with "premeditated," though no particular period of time is required for the deliberation. People v. Mongane, 1 N. Y. Cr. R. 411, 413.

No specific length of time implied.

The question as to the meaning of the terms "deliberation and premeditation," which a statute requires to constitute the crime of murder, has frequently been considered. In People v. Majone, 91 N. Y. 211, 212, the same question was under consideration, and Earl, J., said: "Under the statute, there must also be a deliberate and premeditated design to kill. Such design must precede the killing by some appreciable space of time. But the time need not be long. It must be sufficient for some reflection and consideration upon the matter, for choice to kill or not to kill, and for the formation of a definite purpose to kill. And when the time is sufficient for this, it matters not how brief it is. The human mind acts with celerity which it is sometimes impossible to measure, and whether a deliberate and premeditated design to kill was formed must be determined from all the circumstances of the case." People v. Constantino, 47 N. E. 37, 41, 153 N. Y. 24 (citing People v. Conroy, 97 N. Y. 62, 76, People v. Hawkins, 109 N. Y. 408, 17 N. E. 371, and People v. Johnson, 139 N. Y. 358, 34 N. E. 920).

An act performed in deliberation is the opposite of one performed in uncontrollable passion, which prevents deliberation or cool reflection in forming a purpose. Davison v. People, 90 Ill. 229; Spies v. People, 122 Ill. 1, 174, 12 N. E. 865, 17 N. E. 898, 8 Am. St. Rep. 320. While the deliberate intent necessary to malice aforethought must have been in the mind at the time of the killing, it need not have been entertained for any considerable time. Marzen v. People, 50 N. E. 249, 255, 173 Ill. 43.

In an instruction in a prosecution for murder it was said that: "If an intention to kill exists, it is willful. If this intention be accompanied by such circumstances as evidence a mind fully conscious of the purpose designed, it is deliberate." It was held that this was a clear and explicit statement that, in order to constitute the act one of premeditated and deliberate malice, the intent to perform it preceded the performance, and that the mind must have beforehand considered it and determined upon it. It is, no doubt, true that the term "deliberation" requires some time for reflection, and that it is not sufficient that the intent to kill be formed simultaneously with the striking of the blow. Simmerman v. State, 14 Neb. 568, 17 N. W. 115; Milton v. State, 6 Neb. 136. But in the latter case it was said where a person has actually formed the purpose maliciously to kill another, and had deliberated and premeditated thereon before committing the offense, the length of time that intervened between the time such purpose is formed and its execution is not material. Carleton v. State, 61 N. W. 699, 712, 43 Neb. 373.

To constitute "deliberate and premeditated malice," the intent to do the injury must have been deliberated upon, and the design to do it formed, before the act was done, though it is not required that either should have been for any considerable time before. This supposes the party by reflection understood what he was about to do, and intended to do it in order to do the harm. State v. Turner (Ohio) Wright, 20, 30.

A "deliberate killing" is a killing in which the "intent or purpose is formed upon deliberation or consideration, and the deliberation or consideration need not be for any particular period of time. A moment is as effectual as an hour or a day." People v. Pool, 27 Cal. 572, 585.

"Deliberately" does not necessarily mean brooded over, or considered, or reflected on for a day or a week or an hour, but means an intention to kill, executed by a party not under the influence of a violent passion, suddenly aroused, amounting to a temporary dethronement of the reason, but in the furtherance of a formed design to gratify a feeling of revenge, or to accomplish some other unlawful purpose. State v. Furgerson, 63 S. W. 101, 104, 162 Mo. 668; State v. Spotted Hawk, 55 Pac. 1028, 1038, 22 Mont. 33.

An instruction, in a prosecution for murder, which stated that the jury should find the accused guilty of murder in the first degree, must find that deliberation and premeditation existed before the killing, but it did not matter for how short a time, so they existed before the fatal blow was struck, is incomplete without explaining further what was meant by the terms "deliberation" and "premeditation." State v. Foster, 41 S. E. 284, 286, 130 N. C. 668, 89 Am. St. Rep. 876.

"Deliberately" does not mean brooded over, considered, or reflected upon for a week or a day or an hour, but it means an intent to kill, executed by one in a cool state of the blood, in furtherance of a formed design to gratify a feeling of revenge, or to accomplish some other object, and not under the influence of violent passion suddenly aroused by a real or supposed grievance suffered at the time. State v. Fitzgerald, 32 S. W. 1113, 1116, 130 Mo. 407; State v. McKenzie, 45 S. W. 1117, 144 Mo. 40; State v. Gatlin, 70 S. W. 885, 888, 170 Mo. 354; State v. Ashcraft, 70 S. W. 898, 900, 170 Mo. 409; State v. McMullin, 71 S. W. 221, 224, 170 Mo. 608; State v. Fairlamb, 25 S. W. 895, 897, 121 Mo. 137. The passion here referred to is that only which is produced by what the law recognizes as a just cause of provocation. State v. Howell, 23 S. W. 263, 267, 117 Mo. 307.

By "deliberately and with premeditation," in instructions defining murder, is not meant that any particular length of time need intervene between the formation of the purpose to kill and its execution. It is not necessary that the deliberation and premeditation should continue for a day, an hour, or a minute, but it is enough that the design to kill is fully and clearly received in the mind, and purposely and deliberately executed. State v. Zdanowicz, 55 Atl. 743, 746, 69 N. J. Law, 619.

"Deliberately" does not mean brooded over or contemplated upon for a week, a day, or an hour. No specified time need be shown for such deliberation; a moment will do as well as an hour. State v. Seaton, 17 S. W. 169, 171, 106 Mo. 198.

"Deliberate and premeditated malice" means a fixed design to unlawfully take human life, accompanied with some degree of reflection thereon, and the act of killing, which follows. The premeditation and reflection thereon may take place but a moment before the doing of the act, but both states of mind must have actually existed to make the offense murder in the first degree. State v. Gin Pon, 47 Pac. 961, 963, 16 Wash. 425.

By the term "deliberate and premeditated" is not meant that the killing must have been conceived or intended for any particular length of time; it is sufficient if it was done with reflection and conceived beforehand. State v. Shuff (Idaho) 72 Pac. 664, 668.

"Deliberate and premeditated," as used in Code, § 3725, defining murder, means only this: that the slayer must intend before the blow is delivered, though it be only for an instant of time before, that he will strike at the time he does strike, and that death will be the result of the blow. Daughdrill v. State, 21 South. 378, 386, 113 Ala. 7.

The word "deliberate," as used in a discussion of murder relative to the deliberate intent to kill, etc., does not, in its legal acceptance, so much import an act done after time for reflection, as it imports a voluntary act, an act done on motive of purpose and design, in contradistinction to acts done in the heat of passion, a paroxysm of resentment, in which reason and choice for the moment have no agency. The books constantly speak in this connection of a "deliberate" act, however sudden, whereas, if deliberation implied time and reflection, a "deliberate" act could never be sudden. Commonwealth v. York, 50 Mass. (9 Metc.) 93, 107, 43 Am. Dec. 373.

Will power implied.

The terms "deliberately" and "willfully" necessarily imply a certain degree of will power. State v. Maier, 15 S. E. 991, 996, 86 W. Va. 757.

DELIBERATE CONVICTION.

"Deliberate conviction," as used by a juror with reference to a case on which he was called, was equivalent to the expression "fixed opinion," which, according to the modern authorities, is the test of qualification. Allison v. Commonwealth, 99 Pa. 17, 31.

DELIBERATING UPON THE ACCUSATION.

The phrase, "deliberating upon the accusation against the defendant," in Code Cr. Proc. art. 523, providing that an indictment may be set aside if any person unauthorized by law was present when the grand jury was deliberating upon the accusation against the defendant, is of the same meaning as the phrase "discussing the propriety of finding a bill of indictment" in article 394, providing that the state's attorney may come before the grand jury at any time except when they are discussing the propriety of finding a bill of indictment, etc. Stuart v. State, 34 S. W. 118, 35 Tex. Cr. R. 440. Thus the presence of an unauthorized person during the taking of the testimony is insufficient to authorize the setting aside of the indictment. Sims v. State (Tex.) 45 S. W. 705, 706.

DELIBERATIVE BODY.

The term "deliberative body" is properly applied to a town meeting which "acts as such in determining all matters that may lawfully be determined by it as any other deliberative body, except in the election of certain officers of the town, and except as to matters, which by express law, the question to be determined by the electors of the town is required to be determined by a vote or ballot." State v. Racine County, 36 N. W. 399, 403, 70 Wis. 543.

DELINEATION.

Act Sept. 26, 1888, c. 1039, 25 Stat. 496 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2661], declares that all matter, otherwise mailable by law, upon the envelope or outside wrapper of which, or any postal card upon which, any "delineations" of an indecent or threatening character, calculated by the terms or style of display to reflect injuriously upon the character of another, may be written or printed, is nonmailable, etc. It was held that the term "delineations" signified representations expressed otherwise than by language, as by the use of figures, drawings, colors, etc., for the fact that a dunning letter is contained in the envelope may be expressed by a figure or other sign impressed upon it of a character recognized as conveying such expression by those who may see it. Such figure or sign is a "delineation" within the meaning of the statute. United States v. Dodge (U. S.) 70 Fed. 235, 236.

DELINQUENCY.

"Delinquency," when applied to a merchant, cannot mean anything less than that he has proved to be dishonest and attempted to evade the payment of his debts. Boyce v. Ewart (S. C.) Rice, Law, 126, 140.

"Delinquency" is only another name for gross neglect to perform a lawful obligation, or willful default, either of which is a proper subject for penalties. To say that a taxpayer is delinquent merely because, without demand, he does not pay over more than $6,000 of his money when he believes he does not owe more than $3,000, and it afterwards turns out by judicial decree that he was right, is a misapplication of the term "delinquent." Ferguson v. City of Pittsburgh, 28 Atl. 118, 121, 159 Pa. 435.

A "delinquent" is defined in Webster's Dictionary to be "one failing in duty; offending by neglect of duty." The second definition is "one who fails to perform his duty; an offender or transgressor; one who commits a fault or crime." The innuendo to be gathered from the words in a book or pamphlet published by a retail grocers' association organized for the purpose of collecting bad debts, and called "Delinquent Book," means that the pages following contain the names of persons whom said association has found to be dishonest and unworthy of credit. Cleveland Retail Grocers' Ass'n v. Exton, 18 Ohio Cir. Ct. R. 321, 324, 10 O. C. D. 145, 148.

DELINQUENT CHILD.

As used in the chapter relating to the juvenile court, the words "delinquent child" shall include any child under the age of 16 years who violates any law of this state or any city or village ordinance, or who is incorrigible, or who knowingly associates with thieves or vicious or immoral persons, or who is growing up in idleness or crime, or who knowingly frequents a house of ill fame, or who knowingly patronizes any policy shop or place where any gaming device is or shall be operated. Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 548-38.

DELINQUENT DEBTOR.

Section 3, subd. 5, of the act relating to assignments for the benefit of creditors, provides that the debtor should make an inventory of his property within a certain time after making the assignment, and, in case he shall fail to do so within such time, that the assignee shall then make a schedule, and that if he should fail to do so he shall be removed by the judge; and then further provides that "the books and papers of such delinquent debtor shall at all times be subject to the inspection and examination of any creditor. The county judge is authorized by order to require such debtor or assignor to allow such inspection or examination." Held that, by providing that the books and papers should "at all times be subject to inspection," an intention was expressed that the words "debtor" and "delinquent debtor" should be taken as synonymous with "assignor," and that such inspection might be made by a creditor prior to the refusal of the debtor to make the inventory, as well as after such refusal. In re H. Hermann Lumber Co., 48 N. Y. Supp. 509, 510, 21 App. Div. 514.

DELINQUENT TAX.

"Delinquency of taxes" necessarily includes present obligation to pay, for such delinquency is the neglect of that obligation. Chauncey v. Wass, 30 N. W. 826, 830, 35 Minn. 1.

"To constitute a legal 'delinquent tax' on land, three things are necessary: (1) That the land is subject to taxation; (2) that a tax authorized by law has been levied on it in the manner provided by law; (3) that the tax remains unpaid after the time appointed by law for its payment. To make a tax delinquent each of these things must be shown; each is as essential as either of the others." Chauncey v. Wass, 30 N. W. 826, 830, 35 Minn. 1.

A tax is not an ordinary debt. It flows from the exercise of sovereign power, and is imposed without the consent of the debtor. The right to tax, and the terms of its exercise, are inseparable. Accordingly, a tax cannot be called a "delinquent tax" until it has been assessed and placed upon the tax duplicate, in accordance with statutory provisions; and the statutes which provide for the assessing of penalties on taxes, which have been duly charged on the tax duplicate, and have not been paid by a certain date, do not confer authority for the assessment of penalties on taxes for past years, levied on property which has escaped assessment in such years. Gallup v. Schmidt, 56 N. E. 443, 450, 154 Ind. 196.

DELINQUENT TAXPAYER.

Taxation Act 1889, § 54, declares that the publication of notice of delinquent taxes shall be equivalent to personal notice on persons not personally served, and section 53 declares that the subpoena shall be personally served on the delinquent taxpayer if he can be found within the state, and, if he cannot be so found, the return of the officer shall so state. Held, that the term "delinquent taxpayer," as used in section 53, was intended to apply to and embrace persons against whom the tax was assessed and whose names appeared on the assessment roll, and did not include persons holding the title by virtue of a conveyance made after the assessment. Fowler v. Campbell, 59 N. W. 185, 186, 100 Mich. 398.

DELIRIUM.

Delirium is a fluctuating state of mind created by temporary excitement, in the absence of which, to be ascertained by the appearance of the patient, the patient is most commonly really sane. Brodgen v. Brown, 2 Add. 441, 443.

Delirium "is a temporary derangement of the mind, and is always preceded or attended by a feverish and highly diseased state of the body. It may vary in intensity from slight wanderings of the mind to more violent mental derangement, and it may be accompanied in a greater or less degree with stupor or insensibility." Clark's Heirs v. Ellis, 9 Or. 128, 132.

Delirium is that state of the mind in which it acts without being directed by the power of volition, which is wholly or partially suspended. This happens most perfectly in dreams. But what is commonly called "delirium" is always preceded or attended by a feverish and highly diseased state of the body. The patients in delirium are wholly unconscious of surrounding objects, or conceive them to be different from what they really are. Their thoughts seem to drift about, wildering and tossing amidst distracted dreams; and their observations, when they make them, as often happens, are wild and incoherent; or from excessive pain they sink into a low muttering or silent and deathlike stupor. The law contemplates this species of mental derangement as an intellectual eclipse; as a darkness occasioned by a cloud of disease passing from the mind, which must soon terminate in health or in death. Owings' Case (Md.) 1 Bland, 370, 386, 17 Am. Dec. 311.

"Delirium" is defined as mental aberration or wandering of the mind. "Illness" is defined as a disorder of health; sickness. Under these definitions, where the deceased was suffering from violent pains in the head, which had continued for some time, and seemed to be wandering and distraught, there was at least ground for the conclusion that he was suffering from "delirium resulting from illness," within the meaning of a benefit certificate providing that the insurer should pay benefits of members who commit suicide in delirium resulting from illness. Supreme Lodge Knights of Honor v. Lapp's Adm'x, 74 S. W. 656, 657, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 74.

DELIRIUM TREMENS.

Authorities all agree that delirium tremens is a disease of a very distinct and strongly marked character, and as little liable to be mistaken as any known in medicine. The symptoms are: (1) Delirium taking the form of apprehensiveness on the part of the patient. He is fearful of something; fears pursuit by officers or foes. Sometimes demons and snakes are about him. In the earlier stages, in attempting to escape from his imaginary pursuers, he will attack others as well as injure himself. But he is much more apprehensive of receiving injury than desirous of inflicting it, except to escape. He is generally timid and irresolute, and easily pacified and controlled. (2) Sleeplessness. Delirium tremens cannot exist without this. (3) Tremulousness, especially of the hands, but showing itself in the limbs and the tongue. (4) After a time sleep occurs, and reason itself returns. United States v. McGlue (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 1093, 1096.

"Delirium tremens" has an ordinary and accepted meaning, and is in common use by English-speaking people. Webster's definition is as follows: "A violent delirium induced by the excessive and prolonged use of intoxicating liquors." The Century Dictionary gives the following definition: "A disorder of the brain arising from an inordinate and protracted use of ardent spirits, and therefore almost peculiar to drunkards. Delirium is a constant symptom, but the tremor is not always conspicuously present. It is properly a disease of the nervous system." Etna Life Ins. Co. v. Deming, 24 N. E. 86, 87, 123 Ind. 384.

A life policy which provided that the same should be void in case the insured should come to his "death by delirium tremens" meant death by voluntary and habitual drunkenness. St. Louis Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Graves, 69 Ky. (8 Bush) 268, 271.

"Delirium tremens" is a kind of insanity produced by alcoholism, caused by the breaking down of the person's system by long continued or habitual drunkenness, and brought on by abstinence from drink. It is called "settled insanity" to distinguish it from "temporary insanity," or drunkenness directly resulting from drink. Evers v. State, 20 S. W. 744, 748, 31 Tex. Cr. R. 818, 18 L. R. A. 421, 37 Am. St. Rep. 811.

As insanity.

See "Insane—Insanity."

As affecting responsibility for crime.

"Delirium tremens, though the result or consequence of continued intoxication, is insanity or a diseased state of the mind which affects responsibility for crime in the same way as insanity produced by any other cause." Macconnehey v. State, 5 Ohio St. 77, 78.

"Delirium tremens is a species of insanity, rendering the party incapable of committing a crime. Though usually occurring in habitual drinkers after a few days' total abstinence from spirituous liquors, it may result directly and immediately from drunkenness." Erwin v. State, 10 Tex. App. 700, 702.

Delirium tremens is the result of intemperance, and therefore in some sense is voluntarily brought on, yet it is distinguishable, and by the law is distinguished from that madness which sometimes accompanies drunkenness. If a person suffering from delirium tremens is so far insane as to render him irresponsible, the law does not punish him for any crime he may commit. But if a person commit a crime while intoxicated, the law punishes him however mad he may have been. Carter v. State, 12 Tex. 500, 506, 62 Am. Dec. 539.

DELIVER—DELIVERY.

See "Absolute Delivery"; "Actual Delivery"; "Awaiting Delivery"; "Claim and Delivery"; "Conditional Delivery"; "Constructive Delivery"; "Immediate Delivery"; "Proper Delivery"; "Substituted Delivery"; "Symbolical Delivery."

Before delivery, see "Before."

A delivery is a transfer of the possession of property from the vendor to the vendee, and when so transferred from the seller to the buyer, or vendor to the vendee, the title vests and he becomes the owner. Turner v. Moore, 3 Atl. 467, 470, 58 Vt. 455.

"A delivery of a deed is in fact its tradition from the maker to the person to whom it is made, or to some person for his use, and, if the person receiving it for another is authorized to do so, it is not only immediately the maker's deed, but it cannot be rejected by the grantee." Kirk v. Turner, 16 N. C. 14, 20.

The tradition or delivery is the transferring of the thing sold into the power and possession of the buyer. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 2477.

"Delivery" signifies, as a popular word, mere tradition, but in legal phraseology means the final, absolute transfer to the grantee of a complete legal instrument, sealed by the grantor, covenantor, or obligor. Black v. Shreve, 13 N. J. Eq. (2 Beasl.) 455, 461.

"Unfortunately the word 'delivery' is used in reports and lawbooks in two widely different senses. It is most frequently used in reference to the change of possession of a chattel, but sometimes it is used in reference to the change of property in a chattel which may in certain cases take place without any change of possession. In other words, this word 'delivery' is generally used to denote transfer of possession, but sometimes to denote transfer of title." Bloyd v. Pollocks, 27 W. Va. 75, 128, 129.

The use of the words "sell, exchange, and deliver" in an indictment for forgery, in place of the words used in the statute, "pass, utter, and publish," sufficiently describe the offense, for "selling, exchanging, and delivering" a bank bill or piece of money is, in common parlance, passing the bill or money. State v. Mills, 47 S. W. 938, 941, 146 Mo. 195 (citing State v. Watson, 65 Mo. 115).

"Deliver," as used in a lease of a widow's one-third of her husband's farm, in which the tenant agreed to deliver to the lessor a certain portion of all the produce raised thereon, means something more than to deposit the whole crop in a specified place. The lessor's portion must be secured. Manwell v. Manwell's Estate, 14 Vt. 14, 23.

A delivery of chattels necessarily presupposes three features, viz., chattels that are to be delivered, a party who is to make the delivery, and a party who is to accept or receive the delivery. Thus a judgment that plaintiff recover a specified sum, and that the sheriff take possession of chattels covered by the mortgage sued on, and sell the same and apply the proceeds in discharge of a money judgment, is not a judgment for the delivery of property, but a money judgment; so that an undertaking to pay the judgment, if confirmed upon appeal, is sufficient. National Bank of Wabpeton v. Hanberg, 87 N. W. 1006, 1007, 10 N. D. 383.

Merely placing goods in such a position that the carrier could easily have taken them, but without calling his attention to them, is not sufficient to constitute a delivery. O'Bannon v. Southern Exp. Co., 51 Ala. 481, 484.

What constitutes delivery in case of a sale depends on the nature and situation of the property. Asportation from the premises is never necessary. It is always sufficient if the agreement be definite and unconditional, and everything has been done in pursuance of it on the part of the vendor which might be necessary to identify the property and separate it from others, so that it may be known specifically what has been sold. Little Rock & Ft. S. Ry. Co. v. Page, 85 Ark. 304, 315.

As either actual or constructive.

The word "delivery," as applied to a deed, may be either actual or constructive, and any words showing an intention on the part of the grantor that the deed shall be considered as completely executed and the title conveyed is sufficient. Tucker v. Allen, 16 Kan. 312, 319.

A delivery is effected either by a manual transfer of the deed from the grantor to the grantee, or to some third party for his use, or by the doing of some act or saying something, or by both, whereby the grantor manifests an unequivocal intention to surrender the instrument so as to deprive himself of all authority over it, or have the right to recall it, and to consummate the conveyance. Payne v. Hallgarth, 54 Pac. 162, 164, 33 Or. 430.

The word "delivery," in the law of sales, may signify a delivery, either actual or constructive; but both forms of delivery contemplate the absolute giving up of the control and custody of the property on the part of the vendor, and the assumption of the same by the vendee. Whether such delivery has taken place depends on the facts of each particular case. Brown v. Dickerson (Del.) 42 Atl. 421, 422, 2 Marv. 119.

In Caldwell v. Wilson (S. C.) 2 Speers, 75, it was held that "delivery," in case of gift, is a transfer of possession, either by actual tradition from hand to hand, or by an expression of the donor's willingness that the donee should take when the chattel was present, and in a situation to be taken by either party. In Beaver v. Beaver, 117 N. Y. 422, 423, 22 N. E. 940, 941, 6 L. R. A. 403, 15 Am. St. Rep. 531, Andrews, J., says the delivery may be symbolical or actual; that is, by actually delivering the custody of the chattel to the donee, or giving to him the symbol which represents possession. Liebe v. Battmann, 54 Pac. 179, 180, 33 Or. 241, 72 Am. St. Rep. 705.

There are in law two kinds of delivery: That which is called "manual" or "actual" delivery, as when one of you sells a horse to another, and you hand him over—that is a case of manual delivery. When one of you rents a house to another and hands him the key, he thereby delivers the house, and that is a "symbolical" delivery; so that if one person has a quantity of corn or wheat in a warehouse, and should sell it to another and hand over the warehouse receipts, it would be a complete delivery of the grain. Edwards v. Hoefflinghoff (U. S.) 88 Fed. 635, 641.

Delivery of a deed may be either actual, by doing something and saying nothing, or else verbal, by saying something and doing nothing, or it may be both. Arrison v. Harmstead, 2 Pa. (2 Barr) 191, 193; Dwinell v. Bliss, 5 Atl. 817, 818, 58 Vt. 853; Bank of Healdsburg v. Bailhache, 4 Pac. 106, 108, 65 Cal. 327; McGrath v. Hyde (Cal.) 21 Pac. 948, 949.

Delivery may be either actual or verbal, and if delivered by words no particular form of words is essential for such purpose; it is sufficient that there be an intention or assent of the mind to treat it as the deed of the grantor, to clothe it with the attributes of a legal instrument. Byers v. McClanahan (Md.) 6 Gill & J. 250, 253.

Actual manual delivery not essential.

What will amount to a delivery must depend upon the nature of the thing and the circumstances of the case. Actual manual delivery is not in all cases necessary. Where the thing is incapable of actual delivery, or where the situation of the parties and the circumstances of the case will not admit of it, it may be symbolical or constructive. There may be circumstances under which a gift may be complete and valid as between donor and donee without delivery; and the possession of the former will not be inconsistent with the right of the latter. So where a father procured a brand to be recorded in the name of his child, and branded certain cattle with the brand so recorded, with the avowed object of making a gift of the cattle to the child, it was held that there was a sufficient delivery to consummate the gift. Hillebrant v. Brewer, 6 Tex. 45, 49, 50, 55 Am. Dec. 757.

Actual manual delivery and change of possession are not required in order to constitute an effectual delivery, but whether there has been a delivery or not must be decided by determining what was the intention of the grantor, and by regarding the particular circumstances of the case. Black v. Sharkey, 37 Pac. 939, 104 Cal. 279.

To constitute a delivery of personal property, it is not always necessary that there should be an actual removal of the goods and a change of possession from hand to hand, but where, from the nature of the article, it could not be removed without great expense and inconvenience, an intention to transfer the right of possession is a sufficient delivery. Allen v. Smith, 10 Mass. 308, 311.

Manual delivery of a deed is not always necessary to effectuate it. The delivery of a deed depends on the intent of the parties, and, though not in formal words, may be shown by circumstances. If the parties meet to make it, and read, sign, and acknowledge it without reservation, this amounts to a delivery. Adams v. Baker, 40 S. E. 356, 357, 50 W. Va. 249.

"Delivery" may be defined to be a word, act, or both combined, by which a grantor expresses a present intention to divest himself of title to property described in an appropriate deed. Manual delivery is not necessary, but in its absence the grantor must have, by some word expressed or act done, clearly indicated his intention at the time of its signing by him, or subsequently while the deed is in his possession, that the deed shall be considered as executed. Fitzpatrick v. Brigman, 30 South. 500, 501, 130 Ala. 450.

A manual delivery of a deed is not required, nor is the acceptance of the bodily possession of the paper itself. The delivery may be shown by acts without words, or words without acts, or both. Possession by the grantee is persuasive evidence of previous delivery. Delivery may be completed after the death of the grantor, and acceptance may be after the death of the grantee. In 18 states, including Kentucky, it has been held that manual delivery of the deed is not required. It is sufficient if from the facts, conduct, and expressed intention of the party it may be fairly gathered that the grantor intended to divest himself of the title by the instrument, and that the grantee intended to be thereby invested with the title so granted. Shoptaw v. Ridgway's Adm'r (Ky.) 60 S. W. 723, 724.

It is not necessary that there should be an actual handing over of the instrument to constitute a delivery, and it may be delivered by words without acts, or by acts without words, or by both acts and words. Shep. Touch, 58. A deed may be effectual to pass real estate though it be left in the custody of the grantor. Thus, if both parties be present, and the contract is to all appearances consummated without any conditions or qualifications annexed, it is still a complete and valid deed, notwithstanding it be left in the custody of the grantor. Souver Bye v. Arden (N. Y.) 1 Johns. Ch. 240; Jones v. Jones, 6 Conn. 111, 16 Am. Dec. 35; Doe v. Knight, 5 Barn. & C. 671; 4 Kent, Comm. 448. It is, however, necessary that there should be something evincing the intention. It must necessarily appear, if not from acts and express words, yet from circumstances at least, that there was the intention to part with the deed, and, of course, to pass the title. Crawford v. Bertholf, 1 N. J. Eq. (Saxt.) 458, 467.

Acceptance implied.

To constitute the delivery of a deed, there must not only be a delivery by the grantor, but an acceptance by the grantee. Bank of Healdsburg v. Bailhache, 4 Pac. 106, 65 Cal. 327. Acceptance by a grantee is an essential part of the delivery of a deed. Powell v. Banks, 48 S. W. 664, 667, 146 Mo. 620.

The term "delivery," when used in reference to a conveyance, implies acceptance. There may be delivery in escrow, and there may be transfer of manual possession for examination or other purposes, but without acceptance there is merely a tender. Delivery implies both tender and acceptance. Tate v. Clement, 35 Atl. 214, 176 Pa. 550.

A deed cannot be delivered without being accepted, and the word "delivery" includes acceptance, though there might be a mere manual delivery of a deed by some fraud which would not include an acceptance. Ordinarily, the averment that a deed was delivered implies that it was accepted. Davenport v. Whisler, 46 Iowa, 287.

A delivery of a deed is in fact its tradition from the maker to the person to whom it is made, or to some person for his use, for his acceptance is presumed until the contrary is shown. It being for his interest, the presumption is not that he will accept, but that he does. Chapin v. Nott, 67 N. E. 833, 834, 203 Ill. 341 (citing Robbins v. Rascoe, 120 N. C. 79, 26 S. E. 807, 38 L. R. A. 238, 58 Am. St. Rep. 774).

Where a bond was written and executed by one of the obligors in California, and the money then paid thereon by the obligee, and the bond was then sent to the other obligor in Nevada, who executed it and sent it to the obligee, the bond was delivered and took effect when it left the hands of the last obligor. Usually a bond must be accepted by the obligee before the delivery is completed, but where the obligee has paid the consideration for a bond already drawn, and it is thereafter executed and sent to him, there is a clear agreement to accept that bond when executed, and the delivery and acceptance both date from the moment that the bond is delivered by the obligor to some person or public conveyance to be taken to the obligee. Alcalda v. Morales, 3 Nev. 132, 136.

"Delivered," as used in the statute of frauds, providing that it shall embrace, among other contracts, those in relation to the sale of personal property when no part of the property is "delivered" and no part of the price paid, cannot be construed as synonymous with the terms "accept" and "receive," nor is it equivalent to the word "accepted." Goods may be delivered and not accepted, but, on the contrary, rejected as not corresponding to sample, or as otherwise contrary to the conditions of the contract. "Delivered" is equivalent to "received." Delivery alone, without acceptance, is sufficient to dispense with the necessity of writing. The delivery of the possession of goods is an open, feasible, and tangible act. It is a physical act manifesting the intention of the party. A sale, therefore, with delivery of possession, is a totally different thing from a sale by mere words. Delivery and possession accomplish every purpose of the statute, and the mere act of acceptance could add little or nothing to that purpose. Hence, as delivery of goods to a common carrier for conveyance to the buyer is such a delivery to the buyer through his agent, the carrier, as suffices to put an end to the vendor's lien, and constitutes an actual receipt by the purchaser, where there has been such a delivery the goods have been "delivered" to the purchaser within the statute of frauds, and the contract is binding on him. Bullock v. Tschergl (U. S.) 13 Fed. 345, 346.

The word "deliver" has many meanings, and what particular meaning among its many definitions is to be assigned to the word depends on the connection in which it is used. As used in an instruction, in an action against a city for injuries resulting from the negligent piling of lumber in a street, that if at the time defendant had a contract with any person to furnish it with lumber and deliver same, and such person did actually "deliver" and pile the lumber in the street, then the act was not the act of the city, and the latter is not liable for negligence of such person in placing the same in the street, unless it had notice thereof, etc., means the same as the word "placing" in the latter part of the instruction, and cannot be construed to involve acceptance, and therefore notice, by the city. City of Evansville v. Senhenn, 51 N. E. 88, 90, 151 Ind. 42, 41 L. R. A. 728, 68 Am. St. Rep. 218.

Delivery of a deed includes a surrender and an acceptance, both of which are necessary to its completion. This must be the result of contract, the meeting of two minds, the accord of two wills. The grantor must be willing and agree to deliver, and the grantee must be willing and consent to receive, and this accord of wills must be evinced in some way to show the unequivocal intention of both parties that the instrument shall take effect according to its purport and tenor. Best v. Brown (N. Y.) 25 Hun, 223, 224 (citing Fisher v. Hall, 41 N. Y. 416; Brackett v. Barney, 28 N. Y. 333). Delivery of a deed includes the surrender and acceptance. Both are necessary to the completion of the delivery. The grantor must be willing and agree to deliver, and the grantee must be willing and consent to receive, and this meeting of minds must be evidenced in some way to show the unequivocal intention of both parties that the instrument shall take effect according to its purport and tenor.

Rousseau v. Blean, 14 N. Y. Supp. 712, 716, 60 Hun, 259.

"Delivered," as used in How. Ann. St. § 2278, requiring a liquor bond to be filed with or delivered to the county treasurer, was not used in the legal sense of a delivery necessary to the execution of a contract, the duty of the treasurer in regard to it being merely clerical, as an act, not to give effect to the bond, but to make and perpetuate a record of it, he having no discretion in regard to the receipt and filing of it. Brockway v. Petted, 45 N. W. 61, 79 Mich. 620, 7 L. R. A. 740.

Acceptance by other than grantee.

Where a father, on purchasing and paying for two lots, had them conveyed to his two minor sons, the acceptance of the deed by the father for the sons was a sufficient delivery. Rhea v. Bagley, 38 S. W. 1039, 63 Ark. 374, 36 L. R. A. 86.

Change of possession implied.

The term "delivery," as used in the negotiable instruments law, means transfer of possession, actual or constructive, from one person to another. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 653, c. 73, § 207; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, Negotiable Instruments Law, § 191, p. 1060; Code Supp. Va. 1898, § 2841a; Ann. Codes & St. Or. 1901, § 4592; Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 3178.

A delivery of an article consists in handing the article to the person to whom the delivery is made. Bellows v. Folsom, 27 N. Y. Super. Ct. (4 Rob.) 43, 48.

Delivery may be either actual or constructive. It must divest the donor of possession and dominion over the thing given. It must be secundum subjectam materiam, and be the true and effectual way of obtaining the command and dominion of the subject. It depends to some extent on the character of the thing given and the relative situation of the parties. There must be a positive change of possession, and the donor must have put it out of his power to recall the gift or repossess himself of its subject-matter. Crouse v. Judson, 84 N. Y. Supp. 755, 757, 41 Misc. Rep. 338.

"Delivered" is sometimes used to mean a transfer of title, but sometimes a transfer of possession, and, in a deed declaring that the parties "have sold, conveyed, and delivered," does not necessarily imply that the actual possession of the property was delivered to the grantee. Martin Browne Co. v. Morris, 42 S. W. 423, 428, 1 Ind. T. 495.

"Deliver," as used in a return of the service of process reciting that the process was served by delivering to the defendant a true and certified copy of the same, means to transfer, as to deliver a letter from one person to the other, and imports an actual delivery or a delivery in fact, which is the transfer of the physical possession in esse. Betts v. Boyd, 45 N. W. 889, 890, 81 Neb. 815.

"Deliver," as used in Rev. St. § 3892 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2657], inflicting a punishment on any person for the taking of mail out of the post office or branch post office, or from a letter or mail carrier, or which has been in any post office or branch post office, or in the custody of any letter or mail carrier, before it has been delivered to the person to whom it is directed, etc., means an actual manual delivery to the party addressed, or his authorized agent. The word "deliver" has perhaps as many different shades of meaning ascertained by judicial interpretation as any other term known to the law. As between carrier and consignee, delivery implies the mutual acts of the two. United States v. McCready (U. S.) 11 Fed. 225, 234, 237.

The term "delivery" is used in the law of sales in very different senses, being used in turn to denote transfer of title and transfer of possession. Where the parties have agreed, and the specific articles are appropriated and accepted, then, independent of the statute of frauds, it is often said there is sufficient delivery to pass the title, although there be no transfer of possession. Morse v. Sherman, 106 Mass. 430, 433.

To constitute a delivery, there must be a change of possession from the shipper to the carrier, and the former must relinquish all custody and control of the property for the time being, leaving exclusive possession to the carrier, in order to constitute a sale. Roy v. Griffin, 66 Pac. 120, 121, 26 Wash. 106.

Where a husband has formally executed a deed conveying property to his wife—that is, has signed such a deed with attested witnesses—as between them and their heirs, if nothing appears to the contrary, this will be sufficient evidence of a delivery, notwithstanding he may retain possession, as his possession of the deed and property is consistent with her right to it. Brown v. Brown, 61 Tex. 56, 60.

To constitute a good delivery of a gift inter vivos, there must be an actual change of possession, to the extent that the owner loses the dominion and control over it. Shugart v. Shugart (Tenn.) 76 S. W. 821, 822.

A "delivery," as the word is used in a bill of lading, is such a delivery as is required, in the case of a sale, in those systems of law and in those cases where a delivery is required to consummate a contract and operate a transfer of property. And in those cases it must include a transfer of legal possession, so as to exonerate the vendor or the person making the delivery from all the responsibilities attached to the possession, and to place the risk on the other party. There may be a constructive or symbolical delivery, in its legal effects equivalent to an actual delivery, as the delivery of a raft of lumber lying in a lake or river by the vendor pointing it out to the sight of the vendee, or the delivery of goods in a warehouse by the delivery of the key, with a sufficient description of the goods. In these cases, though there is no passing the goods from hand to hand—"traditio"—there is a legal transfer of the possession, and the risk of the goods is shifted to the purchaser, or to the person to whom the delivery is made under any other contract, as much as though they had been actually been put into his hands. A "delivery," in the strict and proper sense of the word, seems to me always to imply this transfer of possession, actual or legal, and with it the rights and responsibilities attached to the possession. One consequence involved in this doctrine is that to complete the legal delivery there must be an acceptance, actual or implied. This, as I think, is the sense in which the word is used in bills of lading, and in the delivery of the goods. Salmon Falls Mfg. Co. v. The Tangier (U. S.) 21 Fed. Cas. 266, 267.

Change of title implied.

The ordinary test of delivery of a deed is, did the grantor by his acts or words, or both, intend to divest himself of the title to the estate described in the deed? If so, it is delivered. But if not, there is no delivery, and no title passes. In order to constitute a delivery, the grantor must absolutely part with the possession and control of the instrument. Johnson v. Johnson, 54 Atl. 378, 24 R. I. 571.

A bond given to secure the performance of an agreement "to deliver" certain personal property imports a delivery which is to pass the title, there being nothing in the character of the article or the attending circumstances to qualify the language used. Shelton v. French, 33 Conn. 489, 496.

The term "delivered," as used in Rev. St. 1878, § 1691, providing that any person who shall have paid or delivered any greater sum or value as interest than is allowed by law may recover treble the sum paid or value delivered, means such a delivery as passes the title to the party receiving the same. A delivery of the possession of land under an agreement to pass title would not constitute such a delivery. Howe v. Carpenter, 6 N. W. 357, 359, 49 Wis. 697.

The word "delivery" is used in law sometimes with reference to the passing of the property or the title, and sometimes to the change of possession. As used in a contract of sale of certain machinery for which the defendants gave old machinery and their notes, and payments and the notes were delivered to plaintiff's agent, who told defendants to leave the machinery on his farm till called for, there was a delivery of them as used in its first sense; that is, passing title.

Robinson v. Berkey, 82 N. W. 972, 973, 111 Iowa, 550.

"Delivery," in its legal sense, may denote a transfer of title to the thing sold, or it may mean a transfer of possession. In some cases between the parties, as well as between them and other persons affected by a complete contract and bargain and sale of goods, it may be necessary to consider whether the reciprocal obligation imposed by the terms of the sale on the seller and buyer have been enforced. In such cases delivery, whether actual or constructive, may be evidence of performance. De Bary v. Souer (U. S.) 101 Fed. 425, 428, 41 C. O. A. 417.

Consent of grantor essential.

To constitute a delivery, the deed should appear to have come into the possession of the grantee as a conveyance by the consent of the grantor. If a deed be placed in the hands of a grantee, not for the purpose of having it take effect as a deed, but for some other purpose, that is no delivery of it as a deed, and no title will be conveyed by it. Rhodes v. School Dist. No. 14 in Gardiner, 30 Me. (17 Shep.) 110, 112.

As deliver free from incumbrance.

A contract to build and deliver a vessel requires that it be built and actually delivered free from any valid lien or incumbrance growing out of acts of the builder. The Revenue Cutter No. 2 (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 568.

As deliver in exchange.

The word "deliver," as applied to coin or bank notes, means to deliver in exchange for something else, and is equally expressed by the words "sell," "exchange," or "pass." State v. Watson, 65 Mo. 115, 119.

Delivery by indorsement.

The delivery of the bill of lading of a car of wheat by indorsement in blank to the purchaser of the wheat is a sufficient delivery thereof to take the transaction out of the statute of frauds. Wadhams & Co. v. Balfour, 51 Pac. 642, 645, 32 Or. 313.

Delivery by mail or to carrier.

A delivery of goods to a common carrier, consigned to a particular person without specific directions, different from ordinary usage, is constructively a delivery to the consignee. Where the vendee is the consignee, the delivery of goods to a common carrier, without qualifications, consigned to that vendee, is in law a constructive delivery to the consignee from the time of shipment and the commencement of the carriage. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co. v. National Live Stock Bank, 53 N. E. 326, 328, 178 Ill. 506 (citing Benj. Sales [2d Am. Ed.] p. 649, par. 693; Merchants' Dispatch Co. v. Smith, 76 Ill. 542).

"Deliver," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 1008, making it the duty of a justice of the peace, on demand, to deliver a certified transcript of his proceedings to the appellant, is not used in the sense of sending it by mail or messenger, but contemplates a delivery at the office of the justice on demand by the appellant. Van Sant v. Francisco, 75 N. W. 1086, 1087, 55 Neb. 650.

Delivery of receipt.

The indorsement and delivery by the bailor of a receipt for goods stored in a private warehouse, in which the bailee undertook to deliver the goods to the bailor upon the payment of charges, but not to hold or deliver to his order, is not such a delivery of the goods stored as is required by the statute of frauds, and does not pass the title in the goods to the indorsee, as against a creditor of the bailor, who attached the goods before notice of such indorsement had been given to the bailee. Hallgarten v. Oldham, 135 Mass. 1, 8-10, 46 Am. Rep. 433.

Delivery of sample.

Where goods are sold by sample, handing over the sample to the buyer does not amount to a delivery and acceptance of a part of the thing sold, so as to take the case out of the seventeenth section of the statute of frauds, but it is otherwise where the buyer draws samples from the bulk after he has purchased the goods. Gardner v. Grout, 2 C. B. (N. S.) 340, 343.

Delivery to third person.

Bouvier defines "delivery" as "the transfer of a deed from the grantor to the grantee, or some person acting in his behalf, in such a manner as to deprive the grantor of the right to recall it at his option." No particular form of delivery is required. A deed may be manually given by the grantor to the grantee, yet this is not necessary. The real test of delivery is, did the grantor, by his acts or words, or both, intend to divest himself of title? If so, the deed is delivered. And it is now well settled that a deed may be delivered to a third person for the grantee, and if subsequently assented to by the grantee, it will be as good a delivery as if handed to him in person; and any words or acts which show an intention to receive the title will be sufficient to prove that acceptance. The delivery of a deed by the grantor to a deputy clerk with directions to put it on record, to which the grantee assented by taking possession of the land conveyed, and listing it for taxation, was a delivery to the grantee. Martin v. Bates, 50 S. W. 38, 39, 20 Ky. Law Rep. 1798, 1800.

A deed need not be delivered to the grantee in person, but one delivered by the grantor to a third person to be delivered to the grantee, and by such third person delivered to the grantee, is effectually delivered.

Schreckhise v. Wiseman (Va.) 45 S. E. 745, 746.

A delivery to any third person, intended to make the conveyance operative, is a legal delivery. Where a deed is deposited with a third person, and the future delivery is to depend upon the payment of money or the performance of some other condition, it will be deemed an escrow. Where it is merely to await the lapse of time or the happening of some contingency, and not the performance of any condition, it will be deemed the grantor's deed presently. Still it will not take effect as a deed until the second delivery, but when thus delivered it will take effect by relation from the first delivery. Taft v. Taft, 26 N. W. 426, 428, 59 Mich. 185, 60 Am. Rep. 291.

Where the terms of a deed provided that it was to be delivered and recorded to the grantee on the death of both grantors, the immediate delivery of the deed to a third person, with instructions to hold the same and deliver it to the grantee upon the death of both grantors, was not a delivery violative of the terms of the deed, the delivery there spoken of meaning the actual delivery to the grantee for recording, and not referring to a delivery to a third party to see that such provision was carried out. When the grantor deposited the deed with a third person, and placed it beyond his control or recall, the deed was delivered. Meech v. Wilder, 89 N. W. 556, 557, 130 Mich. 29.

The placing of a note or other instrument in the hands of another, though the payee of the note, does not conclusively establish a delivery of the note or instrument, within the legal meaning of that word. Leaving a note with the payee's employé, as part of an offer to buy land from the payee, is not a delivery thereof. Gross v. Arnold, 52 N. E. 867, 868, 177 Ill. 575.

Where a deed at the time of its execution was delivered to the father of a child non compos mentis, for the benefit of such child, and with an intent to pass title, an acceptance of the conveyance will be presumed, and the delivery is complete. Eastham v. Powell, 11 S. W. 823, 824, 51 Ark. 530.

As equivalent to deliverable.

The term "delivered," as used in an offer to sell certain malt delivered on boat at a certain place, is not equivalent to the word "deliverable" on boat, as used in the acceptance of such offer. The words do not mean the same thing. They require or may require something to be done quite different, as one or the other should be exacted. If the defendant was only required to deliver on board, the operation was very simple. It only obliged the defendant to deposit the malt in the boat, necessitating but the single process of handling and weighing. But if the plaintiff was uncertain as to whether he would have it delivered on the boat, that it might perchance be a good speculation to effect a sale to a third party, who might choose some other method of removal, this might and would require the defendant to separate and weigh the malt, and hold it ready for delivery in any manner, and perhaps at any time, the plaintiff might direct; and if the plaintiff, at some future, convenient season, should conclude to have it delivered on a boat provided by him, it would require the whole mass to be again weighed and delivered. Hence there was a variance between the terms of the offer and acceptance. Myers v. Smith (N. Y.) 48 Barb. 614, 634.

Executory agreement to deliver.

A mere executory agreement to deliver possession is not a delivery, either actual or symbolical, so that an assignment of a share of a crop by a landlord does not constitute a delivery of the crop, and hence amount to a chattel mortgage. Woodward v. Crump, 32 S. W. 195, 95 Tenn. (11 Pickle) 369.

Form or ceremony.

No particular form or ceremony is necessary to constitute delivery. It will be sufficient if a party testifies his intention in any manner—whether by action or by words—to deliver or put into possession of the other party, as if a party throw a deed upon a table with intent that it may be taken up by the other, who accordingly takes it, or if a stranger delivers with assent of the party to the deed. Tarleton v. Griggs, 42 S. E. 591, 592, 131 N. C. 216.

No particular act or formal ceremony is necessary to make a delivery in law. Any act done, coupled with intent to change the ownership, which has the effect of changing the dominion over the thing sold to the buyer, is a delivery. Dodge v. Jones, 14 Pac. 707, 708, 7 Mont. 121.

"No particular form is necessary to constitute the delivery of a deed. It may be by acts without words, or by words without acts, or by both. Anything which clearly manifests the intention of the grantor and the person to whom it is delivered that the deed shall presently become operative and effectual, that the grantor loses all control over it, and that by it the grantee is to become possessed of the estate, constitutes a sufficient delivery." Benneson v. Aiken, 102 Ill. 284, 287, 40 Am. Rep. 592.

"Delivery," in the legal sense, consists in the transfer of the possession and dominion. No formality, either of words or action, is prescribed by law as essential to the delivery, nor is it material how or when the deed came into the hands of the grantee. Whenever the grantor assents to the possession of the deed by the grantee as an instrument of title, then, and not until then, the delivery is complete. White v. White, 55 Pac. 645, 647, 34 Or. 141.

The delivery of a deed is defined to be that part of the operation of executing the deed by which the grantor signifies his intention when and how it is to take effect. It is required by the law in order to demonstrate beyond doubt that the party making the deed meant it to be his act. No precise formulary is required. It is not necessary that there should be an actual handing over of the instrument to constitute a delivery. A deed may be delivered by doing something and saying nothing, or by saying something and doing nothing, or it may be by both. Fain v. Smith, 12 Pac. 365, 367, 14 Or. 82, 58 Am. Rep. 281.

Delivery may be consummated by an act without words, and so it may by words only, without any act of delivery. All the books are to this effect. Shep. Touch. 57, lays down the doctrine thus: "So, if I take the deed in my hand, and use these or the like words: 'Here, take it;' or, 'This will serve;' or, 'I deliver this as my deed;' or, 'I deliver it to you'—these are good deliveries." To the same effect is Cruise's Dig. tit. "Deed," c. 2, § 51: "A deed may be delivered by words without any act of delivery as if the writing sealed lies on the table, and the feoffor says to the feoffee, 'Go and take up the said writing. It is sufficient for you;' or, 'It will serve the turn,' or the like words—it is a sufficient delivery." So, in Cro. Eliz. 7, Shelton's Case: "A deed was sealed in presence of several and of the grantee himself, and read, but not delivered, nor did the grantee take it, but it was left behind them in the same place. The court said that the parties came for the purpose; it was left behind them and not countermanded, and is a good delivery in law." Folly v. Vantuyl, 9 N. J. Law (4 Halst.) 153, 162.

The delivery of a deed, in its legal sense, consists in the transfer of the possession and dominion. It is complete at the moment when the deed is in the hands or power of the grantee with the consent of the grantor, and with his intent that it should operate and inure as a muniment of title to the grantee. The grantee's presence at the time of delivery is not necessary, it being sufficient that the deed goes out of the hands or control of the grantor with his intent that it should go to those of the grantee, or that it ultimately does so. O'Neal v. Brown, 67 Ga. 707, 712 (citing 2 Greenl. Cruise, Real Prop. p. 42).

There is no precise or set form in which the delivery of a deed must be made. It may be delivered by words without acts, or by acts without words, or by both acts and words. After the writing has been executed, an intent, coupled with acts and words evincing such intent, to complete it, and to part absolutely with it and the right over it, is sufficient to give it legal existence as a deed. The books are full of cases to such effect. Woodward v. Woodward, 8 N. J. Eq. (4 Halst. Ch.) 779, 784.

As give.

"Deliver," as used in Sess. Laws 1882, c. 107, pt. 6, § 4, providing that every licensed person who shall sell or deliver intoxicating liquor to any minor shall be fined, etc., is of the same import as the word "give." State v. McMahon, 5 Atl. 596, 598, 53 Conn. 407, 55 Am. Rep. 140.

As give birth to.

In a clause in a will providing that if a daughter "die without leaving any heir of her body, by her begotten and delivered," the word "delivered" indicates a parental and filial relation, so as to show that the word "heir" was limited to the children, and would not include the grandchildren. Granger v. Granger, 44 N. E. 189, 190, 147 Ind. 95, 36 L. R. A. 186, 190.

The word "delivered," when used in speaking of a woman being delivered of a child, means the birth of a live child only. State v. Joiner, 11 N. C. 350, 353.

As give up for safe-keeping.

In construing a statute relative to the issue of bonds by a township in aid of a railroad company, which provided that the bonds should be executed by the supervisor and clerk, and delivered by the person having charge of them to the State Treasurer, who should receipt therefor, and hold the same as trustee for the township and the company, to be disposed of by the said treasurer in the discharge of his trust as theretofore provided, it was said that the delivery which was to be made by the supervisor and clerk was clearly not the technical delivery needed to complete the bonds as negotiable instruments, because the power to hand over to the payee was not conceded to them in any event. The delivery which they were directed to make to the treasurer in his capacity of statutory trustee was only such as amounted to a giving up or the committing of them to the treasurer for safe-keeping. The word was used in its ordinary and popular sense, and not in the technical one. Young v. Clarendon Tp., 10 Sup. Ct. 107, 110, 132 U. S. 840, 33 L. Ed. 356.

Intent.

The delivery of a deed is composed of two constituent parts—an intention to deliver, and an act evincing a purpose to part with the control of the instrument. Johnson v. Johnson, 22 S. E. 419, 423, 44 S. C. 364 (quoting from Carrigan v. Byrd, 23 S. C. 89).

Act and intention are the two elements or conditions essential to a delivery. This intent is to be gathered from the conduct of the parties—particularly the grantor—and all the surrounding circumstances. And if, from all the circumstances in the case, it appears that the grantor by these acts intended to give effect and operation to the deed, and to relinquish all power and control over it, we think it clear the law would give the deed effect accordingly. In other words, such acts would, in law, amount to a delivery. Slattery v. Keefe, 66 N. E. 365, 366, 201 Ill. 483 (citing Weber v. Christen, 121 Ill. 91, 11 N. E. 893, 2 Am. St. Rep. 68).

Delivery of a deed depends on the intent of the parties, and, though not in formal words, may be shown by circumstances. Where the parties meet to make it, and read, sign, and acknowledge it without reservation, this amounts to delivery. Delaplain v. Grubb, 30 S. E. 201, 44 W. Va. 612, 67 Am. St. Rep. 788.

Delivery is a question of intention. The term signifies any manifestation whereby the grantor makes known his intention that the deed is complete and is to take effect. It is not necessary that there shall be any manual transfer of the instrument. McGrath v. Hyde (Cal.) 21 Pac. 948, 949; Hastings v. Vaughn, 5 Cal. 315, 316; Whitney v. American Ins. Co., 59 Pac. 897, 898, 127 Cal. 464; Hudson v. Redford (Ky.) 67 S. W. 35, 36; Brown v. Brown, 61 Tex. 56, 60; Dwinell v. Bliss, 5 Atl. 317, 318, 58 Vt. 353; Gross v. Arnold, 52 N. E. 867, 868, 177 Ill. 575; Bryan v. Wash, 7 Ill. (2 Gilman) 557, 565.

What constitutes a sufficient delivery of a deed is largely matter of intention, and the usual test is, did the grantor, by his acts or words, or both, manifest an intention to make the instrument his deed, and thereby divest himself of title? It is not necessary that there should be a formal delivery, nor that the instrument should be delivered to the grantee in person. Kelsa v. Graves, 68 Pac. 607, 608, 64 Kan. 777.

To constitute a delivery of a deed, the obligor must part with dominion over the deed, with the intent that it must pass to the grantee. The intention of the grantor to part with dominion over the deed must appear from the facts of the case. When the grantor in a voluntary deed places it in the hands of a third person to be delivered at an indefinite time to the grantee, and, before the delivery thereof, such person returns the deed to the grantor, who destroys it, the presumption of law is against the delivery of such deed. Davis v. Ellis, 19 S. E. 399, 400, 39 W. Va. 226.

A delivery of a deed, either as an escrow or absolutely, is an act including intent. It may be by words without act, by an unequivocal act only, or by both combined. It is always a question of fact, resting in pais, to be found by a jury. Lindsay v. Lindsay, 11 Vt. 621, 626.

"Not every act of placing the deed in the hands of the grantor named therein is a delivery, either absolute or conditional—as, if the grantor placed the deed in the hands of such grantee to inspect, or to hand to another person to inspect, this is no delivery, and operates in no manner as a conveyance. To constitute a delivery, there must be intention to part with control over the deed as its owner." Berry v. Anderson, 22 Ind. 36, 39.

Delivery is an incident essential to the execution of a mortgage or other conveyance of real estate. No formality, no particular words, no certain acts, are essential to the valid delivery of a deed. The fact rests in intention, and it is to be collected from all the acts and declarations of the parties having relation to it. It may be actual by the transfer of a conveyance, signed and attested or acknowledged, from the manual possession of the mortgagor to the manual possession of the mortgagee, though not a word has been spoken; or it may be by saying something and doing nothing, as where the mortgage, signed and attested or acknowledged, is lying on the table, and the mortgagor should say, "There is your mortgage," or in any other words equally signifying the mortgagor's intention to part with dominion over it and to pass it to the mortgagee. Arrington v. Arrington, 26 South. 152, 154, 122 Ala. 510.

An intent to deliver a note is not equivalent to a delivery. Montgomery v. Montgomery (Tex.) 54 S. W. 414.

In Dayton v. Newman, 19 Pa. (7 Harris) 194, Justice Wood says delivery may be made by words alone, or by acts alone, or by both together, but there must be sufficient to show an intention to pass the title. A delivery of a deed is not shown where the grantor, after its execution, placed it in a satchel in his room, and gave no directions for its delivery, but said that he did not want the papers therein meddled with, and it was not taken therefrom until after his death. Cameron v. Gray, 52 Atl. 132, 134, 202 Pa. 566.

The recording of a deed raises a presumption of delivery, to be explained or rebutted by the intention of the party recording the deed. Any act presumptively a delivery will not be a delivery if the intent to make it such is wanting, or expressly negated by the acts or words of the grantor. Stevens v. Castel, 63 Mich. 111, 117, 29 N. W. 828.

Where parties consigned and executed a bond for the purpose of enabling another to get money, when they delivered it to him, and left it with him after having executed it, it was, so far as any act of theirs necessary to be done to fix their liability upon the bond, complete. Haywood v. Townsend, 38 N. Y. Supp. 517, 519, 4 App. Div. 246.

As load and store on board.

Where a charter party provided that the charterer was to bring the cargo alongside the vessel and load it, and furnish all the appliances necessary therefor, except the steam for raising it into the vessel, and that demurrage should be charged for delay in delivery of the cargo to the vessel after the specified time, the delivery referred to is the complete and final delivery, not merely alongside, but to the vessel, which did not occur until the cargo was loaded and stowed. Baldwin v. Sullivan Timber Co., 36 N. E. 1060, 1061, 142 N. Y. 290.

More than one act implied.

Acts 1891, c. 290, § 1, making it a misdemeanor for any person to sell or deliver any tickets issued by a railroad, unless he be a duly authorized agent, meant to engage in the business of selling or buying and selling such tickets, and did not imply a single sale, but a multiplicity of such sales, in the sense of a business. State v. Ray, 14 S. E. 83, 84, 109 N. C. 736, 14 L. R. A. 529.

Notice.

When property sold in good faith is at the time in the custody of a third person, notice to him of the sale is sufficient to constitute a delivery as to subsequent purchasers or attaching creditors. Lufkins v. Collins, 7 Pac. 95, 96, 2 Idaho (Hasb.) 150.

Parting with dominion or control over implied.

Delivery is the absolute transfer of a deed properly executed to the grantee in such manner that it cannot be recalled by the grantor. Byers v. McClanahan (Md.) 6 Gill & J. 250, 256.

Delivery of a deed is such an act of the grantor touching its execution as deprives him of the power of controlling its operation, and confers on the grantee the right to enforce it, even against the will and pleasure of the grantor. It need not be delivered to the grantee. It may be delivered to a stranger for his use, even though the grantee did not know of its existence until the grantor's death. Nor need it remain in the possession of a stranger or grantee. It will be valid if it remains in the hands of the grantor, providing it be signed, sealed, and declared by the grantor, in the presence of the attesting witnesses, to be delivered as his deed, and providing there be nothing to qualify the delivery. But the test is: Can the grantee at any time and in any way get possession of it? Can he enforce it against the will of the grantor? Did the grantor intend that at all events and immediately it should operate? And could the grantee have filed a bill to take the instrument into safe custody? Roosevelt v. Carow (N. Y.) 6 Barb. 190, 195.

Delivery is a word, act, or both combined, by which a grantor expresses a present intention to divest himself of title to property described in an appropriate deed. It is a transfer of the deed from the grantor to the grantee, or some person acting in his behalf, in such manner as to deprive the grantor of the right to recall it at his option. Dyer v. Skadan, 87 N. W. 277, 278, 128 Mich. 348, 92 Am. St. Rep. 461.

To constitute a good delivery, the grantor must divest himself of all power and dominion over the deed. Dagley v. Black, 64 N. E. 275, 276, 197 Ill. 53; Pruttsman v. Baker, 30 Wis. 644, 646, 11 Am. Rep. 592. Until then the instrument passes nothing. It is merely ambulatory and gives no title. So long as it is in the hands of a depository, subject to be recalled by the grantor at any time, the grantee has no right to it, and can acquire none; but, if the grantor dies without parting with his control over the deed, it has not been delivered during his life, and after his decease no one can have the power to deliver it. Cook v. Brown, 84 N. E. 460. Thus the leaving by assured with the agent of an insurance company of one of the duplicate copies of the assignment of a life policy is not a delivery to a third person for the benefit of the assignee, but merely compliance with the condition of the policy requiring, in case of assignment, the copy thereof to be furnished to the company to make it valid. Weaver v. Weaver, 55 N. E. 338, 339, 182 Ill. 287, 74 Am. St. Rep. 173. To do this, he must part with the possession of the deed, and all right and authority to control it, either finally and forever, as where it is given over to the grantee himself, or to some person for him, which is called an absolute delivery, or otherwise he must part with all present or temporary right of possession and control until the happening of some future event or the performance of some future condition, upon the happening or not happening or performance or nonperformance of which his right of possession may return, and his dominion and power over the deed be restored, in which case the delivery is said to be contingent or conditional. An essential characteristic and indispensable feature of every delivery, whether absolute or conditional, is that there must be a parting with the possession and of the power and control over the deed by the grantor, for the benefit of the grantee, at the time of delivery. Pruttsman v. Baker, 30 Wis. 644, 646, 11 Am. Rep. 592.

A deed may be deposited with the grantee or handed to him for any other purpose than as the deed of the grantor, or as an effective instrument between the parties, without becoming at all operative as a deed. Ford v. James (N. Y.) 2 Abb. Dec. 159, 163; Denis v. Velati, 31 Pac. 1, 2, 96 Cal. 223. So there was no delivery where an owner of hogs, who agreed to sell them at a certain price per hundredweight, and to deliver them at the stockyards, delivered them as agreed, but there was no one there to receive and weigh them. Shelton v. Thompson, 70 S. W. 256, 257, 96 Mo. App. 327.

To constitute a delivery sufficient to make a valid gift, there must be a parting with the dominion over the subject-matter of the gift, with a present design that the title shall pass out of the donor and to the donee; and this so fully and completely, to all intents and purposes, that, if the donor again resumes control over it without the consent of the donee, he will act as a trespasser. Waite v. Grubbe, 73 Pac. 206, 207, 43 Or. 406.

To constitute a delivery, even of a deed—a single instrument, having no connection with any other—the grantor must part not only with the possession but with the control of the deed, and deprive himself of the right to recall it. If a deed be left by a grantor to be registered, the mere registry is not equivalent to delivery. Commercial Bank v. Reckless, 5 N. J. Eq. (1 Halst. Ch.) 430, 452.

Delivery takes place when the deed, either actually or constructively by record, is placed beyond the control of the grantor. In determining this question of fact, the purpose of the grantor and the grantee in making the deed is an important factor. Gardiner v. Gardiner (Mich.) 95 N. W. 973, 975.

As production for inspection.

"Delivery," as used in Rev. St. § 646, authorizing an appeal to the Supreme Court from an interlocutory order of any circuit court or judge for the payment of money, to compel the execution of any instrument of writing, or the delivery or assignment of any instrument of writing, evidences of debt, documents, or things in action, does not "refer to the mere production of documents for inspection. The meaning of the words is to be determined from those with which they are associated, or, as the maxim is, 'Noscitur a sociis;' and the words with which the word 'delivery' is associated very plainly show that it was not used as meaning the production of instruments of evidence for the purposes of a trial. The statutory provision refers to an order compelling the person against whom it is directed to do an act divesting himself of possession and title, for no other meaning can be justly assigned to the words 'execution, assignment, or delivery,' and these are the words which control the provision." Western Union Tel. Co. v. Locke, 7 N. E. 579, 582, 107 Ind. 9.

Recording.

A delivery may be inferred from the fact that the grantor has had the deed recorded. Fisher v. Hall, 41 N. Y. 416, 423.

The deposit of a paper with the proper officer in order that he may place it on the public records is held to operate as a constructive delivery. McCartney v. McCartney (Tex.) 53 S. W. 388, 390.

The delivery of a deed to the register of deeds by the grantor for the use of the grantee, to be recorded, and the grantee's subsequent assent to the same, is equivalent to an actual delivery to the grantee. Cooper v. Jackson, 4 Wis. 537, 550.

The delivery of a deed by the grantor to a deputy clerk, with directions to put it on record, to which the grantee assented by taking possession of the land conveyed, and listing it for taxation, was a delivery to the grantee. Martin v. Bates (Ky.) 50 S. W. 38, 39.

The recording of a deed is a good delivery, and, where a conveyance is for the benefit of the grantees, their acceptance will be presumed unless disclaimer is affirmatively shown. Whitaker v. Whitaker, 74 S. W. 1029, 1031, 175 Mo. 1.

Leaving a deed for record at the proper office is prima facie delivery. Mallet v. Page, 8 Ind. 364, 367 (citing Gilbert v. North America Fire Ins. Co. [N. Y.] 23 Wend. 43, 35 Am. Dec. 543; Hammell v. Hammell, 19 Ohio, 17; Murray v. Earl of Stair, 2 Barn. & C. 82; Somers v. Pumphrey, 24 Ind. 231, 239.

While the delivery of a deed is necessary to make it effectual in passing title, it is established that when a deed to a minor child is absolute in form and beneficial in effect, and the father and grantor voluntarily causes the same to be recorded, acceptance by the grantee will be presumed, and such facts constitute prima facie a delivery, and afford a reasonable presumption that the grantor intended to part with the title; and clear proof should be made, where a person who, under such circumstances, has executed, acknowledged, and caused a deed to be recorded, before the court would be warranted in declaring that he did not intend to part with his title. Lay v. Lay (Ky.) 66 S. W. 371, 372 (citing Tobin v. Bass, 85 Mo. 654, 55 Am. Rep. 392; Cecil v. Beaver, 28 Iowa, 242, 4 Am. Rep. 174; Masterson v. Cheek, 23 Ill. [13 Peck] 72; Robinson v. Gould, 26 Iowa, 89; Mitchell's Lessee v. Ryan, 3 Ohio St. 377).

As remove.

As used in a policy of insurance, where the property insured consisted of a large amount of lumber piled on docks, some of which had been sold, piled by itself, and marked for the purchaser, and its speedy removal was contemplated, and the provision of the policy was for a year, and covered property owned by insured, and property held by it in trust, or sold and not delivered, and piled on the docks, the word delivered cannot be construed in a technical, legal sense, but must be understood to mean removal from the docks where it was situated. Michigan Pipe Co. v. Michigan Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 52 N. W. 1070, 1072, 92 Mich. 482, 20 L. R. A. 277.

Sale implied.

The word "deliver," as used in a memorandum stating that the undersigned agrees to deliver at a named place a fixed number of bushels for a stated price, imports a sale and delivery of the rye. Bowers v. Whitney, 92 N. W. 540, 541, 88 Minn. 168.

Sealing and acknowledging.

There is no precise form which it is necessary strictly to pursue to constitute delivery. Sealing and acknowledging before a mayor, if the statute is good, amounts to a delivery. Shep. Touch, 58. Under an act of Assembly, Allinson 33, § 3, the acknowledgment of a deed makes it good, to all intents and purposes. Chews v. Sparks, 1 N. J. Law (Coxe) 56, 66, 1 Am. Dec. 188.

As set apart.

"Delivery," as used in a lease of a farm, in which the tenant agreed to deliver to the lessor one-half of all the crops, means to set apart the lessor's portion of the crops, and the tenant has not performed his part of the contract until such delivery. Hurd v. Darling, 14 Vt. 214, 220.

Temporary surrender for examination.

The written instruction, "Papers to be delivered only upon payment of draft," sent to a collector with a draft and a sealed package of papers, is not violated by the collector's allowing the drawee to open the package and examine the papers before payment of the draft, as such a temporary surrender for examination is not a delivery. The word "delivery" could have no double meaning in the letter of instructions, and the delivery which the collector was prohibited from making except upon payment of the draft could be no other than the delivery which it was required to make upon such payment. People's Nat. Bank v. Freeman's Nat. Bank, 47 N. E. 588, 589, 169 Mass. 129, 61 Am. St. Rep. 279 (citing Maynard v. Maynard, 10 Mass. 456, 6 Am. Dec. 146; Mills v. Gore, 37 Mass. [20 Pick.] 28; Shurtleff v. Francis, 118 Mass. 154; Hawkes v. Pike, 105 Mass. 560, 7 Am. Rep. 554; Stevens v. Stevens, 150 Mass. 557, 23 N. E. 378; Markey v. Mutual Ben. Life Ins. Co., 103 Mass. 78; McCreary v. Boston & M. R. Co., 153 Mass. 300, 307, 26 N. E. 864, 11 L. R. A. 359; Parrott v. Avery, 159 Mass. 594, 35 N. E. 94, 22 L. R. A. 153, 38 Am. St. Rep. 465; City of Springfield v. Harris, 107 Mass. 532, 538, 540).

Turning over keys.

The delivery necessary to constitute a valid gift mortis causa may be either actual, by manual production of the subject of the gift, or constructive, by the means of obtaining possession. Constructive delivery is always sufficient when actual, manual delivery is either impracticable or inconvenient. The contents of a warehouse, trunk, box, or other depository may be sufficiently delivered by delivery of the key of the receptacle. Thomas' Adm'r v. Lewis, 15 S. E. 389, 398, 89 Va. 1, 18 L. R. A. 170, 37 Am. St. Rep. 848; Jones v. Selby, Pr. Ch. 300; Ward v. Turner, 2 Ves. Sr. 431, 1 White & T. Lead. Cas. Eq. 1205; Jones v. Brown, 34 N. H. 445; Cooper v. Burr, 45 Barb. 10; Penfield v. Thayer, 2 E. D. Smith, 305; Westerlo v. Dewitt, 36 N. Y. 341, 93 Am. Dec. 517; Ellis v. Secor, 31 Mich. 185, 18 Am. Rep. 178; Hillebrant v. Brewer, 6 Tex. 45, 55 Am. Dec. 757; Elam v. Keen, 4 Leigh, 333, 26 Am. Dec. 322; Stephenson's Adm'r v. King, 81 Ky. 425, 50 Am. Rep. 173; Lee's Ex'r v. Boak, 11 Grat. 182.

The rule that the delivery of property is essential to the validity of a gift is not to be taken in such a narrow sense as to import that the title or property is to go literally into the hands of the recipient, and be carried away. There are many articles which might be made the subject of a donation mortis causa in which a manual delivery of that kind might be inconvenient or impracticable. We have no doubt that a trunk, with its contents, might be effectually given by a delivery of the key, not as a symbolical delivery of the property, but because it is the means of obtaining possession. Coleman v. Parker, 114 Mass. 30, 33 (citing Ward v. Turner, 2 Ves. Sr. 431, 443).

Where a grandfather made a deed of gift to his grandson, and put it among other things in a private box in the bank, and two months before his death delivered the key of the box to the grandson, who retained possession of it, but nothing was said to the grandson, or to any one in his behalf, about a delivery of the deed, no sufficient delivery was shown. Walls v. Ritter, 54 N. E. 565, 566, 180 Ill. 616.

The delivery to the purchaser of the keys to the partnership premises, together with a notification by both partners to the receiver that the dispute between them has been settled, and a direction to him to turn over the property to the purchaser, followed in due time by an order of court discharging the receiver, is a delivery, within the meaning of Civ. Code, § 1781, which provides that a buyer must pay the price of the thing sold on its delivery. Schurtz v. Romer, 23 Pac. 118, 119, 82 Cal. 474.

Unloading of cargo.

Delivery by a common carrier implies mutual acts of the carrier and the consignees, and, where a wharf was the place of delivery, a mere physical landing of the goods on the wharf was no delivery. Ostrander v. Brown (N. Y.) 15 Johns. 39, 42, 8 Am. Dec. 211.

The mere unloading of goods by a vessel does not of itself constitute delivery, if the goods are still subject to the risks of transportation. The St. Georg (U. S.) 95 Fed. 172, 177.

Rev. St. § 2966 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1949], providing that where, by the bill of lading, it appears that goods are to be delivered immediately after the entry of the vessel, the collector is authorized to take possession of the goods and deposit them in a warehouse, does not mean delivered to the consignee, but means delivered in the sense of unloading or discharging from the ship. The Egypt (U. S.) 25 Fed. 320, 323.

Of freight.

If the captain or other officer of a steamboat or other vessel shall, in suitable weather, deposit any freight, in proper manner and in good condition, on the wharf of any city or incorporated town, and shall give verbal or written notice to the consignee thereof one hour before sundown on which the same is deposited on the wharf, such depositing and notice shall constitute a delivery. Rev. St. Mo. 1899, § 5144.

Of treaty.

The exchange of ratifications after the signing of a treaty by plenipotentiaries or commissioners constitutes the delivery of a treaty. Ex parte Ortiz (U. S.) 100 Fed. 955, 962.

Of will.

The words "executed and delivered," in a finding that an executor executed and delivered his will on the day of its date, are appropriate to the allegation of the exercise of a power by appointment inter vivos, and are quite variant from that which would recite the exercise of a power by last will, which would have alleged the instrument to have been published and declared. Wooster v. Cooper, 45 Atl. 381, 387, 59 N. J. Eq. 204.

Of writ.

"Delivery," as the term is used in reference to the delivery of an execution to a sheriff, means the delivery for the purpose of being executed. A delivery of an execution to a sheriff, with instructions to do nothing with it, is no delivery. It is a nullity, and will bind nothing. Cook v. Wood, 16 N. J. Law (1 Har.) 254, 262.

Gen. St. c. 12, § 21, provides that any sheriff, etc., who shall willfully neglect and refuse to serve or return any writ delivered to him, etc., shall pay a fine, etc. Held, that the word "delivered," as used in the section, should be construed to include the laying of a process on a table before the sheriff, with instructions to serve it. By this the writ was offered to him, and made subject to his control, and was a delivery, within the meaning of the statute. Patten v. Sowles, 51 Vt. 388, 391.

DELIVERANCE.

"Deliverance," as used in 1 Rev. Laws 93 relating to actions of replevin, providing that if the defendant in replevin proceedings shall claim the property whereof deliverance is sought, and the sheriff, having due notice, proceeds to make deliverance and dispossess such defendant thereof before the claimed property is tried according to law, such sheriff shall be answerable in trespass, and also forfeit the sum of $100, means—construing it with the other terms of the statute—that the property shall not be taken from the possession of the defendant; that is, to liberate, to set free, or deliver from the defendant. Lisher v. Pierson (N. Y.) 2 Wend. 345, 348, 20 Am. Dec. 612.

DELIVERY BOND.

A delivery bond given to stay execution cannot be regarded as a contract. It is a mere process provided by statute as a means of having execution of the judgment, and at the same time of giving indulgence to the defendant; and, as such, it is under the power of the court, and liable to be quashed as process of the court. Smith v. Brown, 23 Miss. 810, 813.

DELIVERY IN PART.

The statute of frauds, declaring that, to make a sale valid, where the amount of the sale exceeds $50, the contract should be reduced to writing, or money should be paid on account, or that there should be a delivery in whole or in part, means a delivery of a sufficient part of the goods sold to indicate a change of title. A mere taking of a sample on a sale of articles in bags is not a delivery in part, within the meaning of the statute. To constitute a symbolical delivery, the act must show that the vendor relinquishes his control over the property, and places it within the power of the vendee. Carver v. Lane (N. Y.) 4 E. D. Smith, 163, 170.

DELIVERY OF CHILD.

The best writers on medical jurisprudence, as well as the decisions of our courts, concur in this: That, after the child has passed from the body of the mother, a delivery of the child has taken place, so that where a child had been expelled from the womb of its mother, but before the connection between them had been severed, the mother made accusations as to its paternity, she was not within Rev. St. c. 131, § 8, providing that, if at the time of travail she shall accuse the same man with being the father of the child of which she is about to be delivered, she shall be a witness at the trial of the cause. Blake v. Junkins, 35 Me. 433, 435.

DELIVERY OF POSSESSION.

Where in a contract for the sale of land there is a special covenant that on payment of the price the vendor will "deliver possession," such phrase should be construed to mean the delivery of a sufficient deed, and not actual delivery of seisin or possession. Egbert v. Chew, 14 N. J. Law (2 J. S. Green) 446, 455.

DELIVERY TO MARKET.

In an agreement to furnish money enough "to pay off the men within twenty-four hours of the delivery of the said lumber to market," the words "delivery to market" meant arrival at the place of destination. Farrington v. Meek, 30 Mo. 578, 584, 77 Am. Dec. 627.

DELSARTE.

Delsarte was the name of a French artist, who became celebrated for his theory of the method of exercise for developing bodily grace and strength and the power of dramatic expression. The general system or theory has become so well known that the word "Delsartian," as denoting the system, has since become a recognized generic or descriptive word of the English language. Medlar & Holmes Shoe Co. v. Delsarte Mfg. Co. (N. J.) 46 Atl. 1089.

DELUSION.

See, also, "Insane Delusion."

"Delusion" and "insanity" are but terms which are popularly used to indicate a diseased mind. Burkhart v. Gladish, 24 N. E. 118, 119, 123 Ind. 337.

Belief in the impossible.

"Delusion is a belief in something impossible in the nature of things or circumstances of the case. There must be a belief in the mind of the existence of a fact which no sane person would believe under the circumstances of the case, although there might be a shadow of evidence that the fact exists. But this is not the true test to be applied in determining the question whether the act involved is the result of a delusion or not. A single circumstance may be in a particular instance some evidence of the fact believed; but when it is not supported by some further evidence, and is left to stand wholly uncorroborated, it would be the most irrational and improbable thing for a sane mind to believe that the fact existed. The legal proposition to be applied in cases of this character is a general one, and is in substance as before stated, viz.: A belief of the mind which induces the act; a mere delusion which no sane person would believe in. Delusions of the mind, which render void the act caused by such delusions, must be a belief of fact which no sane person would believe." Riggs v. American Home Missionary Soc. (N. Y.) 35 Hun, 656, 658.

Failure of memory.

A delusion is primarily the creation of a perverted or diseased imagination. The failure on the part of the person to remember the death of her brother and sister does not amount to that persistent or incorrigible belief in facts having no real existence which is the essential element of the delusion, but is rather a failure of her memory for the time being. Davis v. Denny, 50 Atl. 1037, 1038, 94 Md. 390.

Impression distinguished.

The term "delusion" refers to the state of the mind, while "impression" signifies the results of that state. Boyd v. Eby (Pa.) 8 Watts. 66, 70, 73.

Mistake of fact.

The term "delusion," as applied to insanity, is not a mere mistake of fact, or the being misled by false testimonial statements to believe that a fact exists which does not exist. Buchanan v. Pierle, 54 Atl. 583, 585, 205 Pa. 123 (citing Robinson v. Adams, 62 Me. 369, 16 Am. Rep. 473).

A delusion, which might incapacitate a person from making a will, is the conception of the existence of something extravagant, which has no existence whatever, but of which the person entertaining it is incapable of becoming permanently disabused by argument, reason, or proof. Stanton v. Wetherwax (N. Y.) 16 Barb. 259. A mere mistake of fact, which is the result of false evidence, is not such a delusion. In re Henry's Will, 41 N. Y. Supp. 1096, 1100, 18 Misc. Rep. 149.

Monomania.

Delusion is a form of insanity in which the subject may be sane on all topics but one, but is insane on some particular topic. This mental condition denotes an impairment or disease of the mental faculties which may more or less affect the mind generally. Merritt v. State, 45 S. W. 21, 22, 39 Tex. Cr. R. 70.

The most common is that of monomania, when the mind broods over one idea and cannot be reasoned out of it. This may operate as an excuse for a criminal act in one of two modes. Either the delusion is such that the person under its influence has a real and firm belief of some fact, not true in itself, but which, if true, would excuse his act; as where the belief is that the party killed had an immediate design upon his life, and under that belief the insane man kills in supposed self-defense. A common instance is where he fully believes that the act he is doing is done by the immediate command of God, and he acts under the delusive, but sincere, belief that the act he is doing is by the command of a superior power, which supercedes all human laws and the laws of nature. Or this state of delusion indicates to an experienced person that the mind is in a diseased state. The known tendency of that state of mind is to break out into violence against friend or foe indiscriminately, so that the act, connecting itself with previous symptoms, will enable an experienced person to say that it was the result of uncontrollable impulse, and not that of a person acted upon by motives and governed by the will. Commonwealth v. Rogers, 48 Mass. (7 Metc.) 500, 502, 41 Am. Dec. 458.

As test of insanity.

"Delusion" is a most difficult word to define, and is very unsatisfactorily done, even by the most acute and metaphysical minds that have investigated it. Shelford, in his treatise on the Laws of Lunacy, says: "The true criterion, the true test, of the absence or presence of insanity, where there is no frenzy or raving madness, seems to be the absence or presence of delusion." "Delusion" and "insanity" seem to be almost convertible terms, so that a patient under a delusion on any subject or subjects is for that reason essentially mad or insane on such subject or subjects to the extent of the delusion. Gass' Heirs v. Gass' Ex'rs, 22 Tenn. (3 Humph.) 278, 283.

Delusion, in a technical sense, is a legal test of the presence of active insanity, and if a will is the offspring of this delusion it should be set aside. It is difficult to conceive how insanity could be judicially established unless delusion of some sort was proven. A delusion offers a practical test of active insanity. Boardman v. Woodman, 47 N. H. 120, 137.

"The true criterion, the true test, of the absence or presence of insanity I take to be the absence or presence of what, used in a certain sense of it, is comprehended in a single term, namely, 'delusion.' * * * In short, I look upon 'delusion' * * * and 'insanity' to be almost, if not altogether, convertible terms; so that a patient, under a delusion, so understood, on any subject or subjects, in any degree, is for that reason essentially mad or insane on such subject or subjects, in that degree." Dew v. Clarke, 3 Add. 79 (cited in State v. Jones, 50 N. H. 369, 395, 9 Am. Rep. 242); State v. Wilner, 40 Wis. 304, 306; In re Shaw's Will (N. Y.) 2 Redf. Sur. 107, 126. CONTRA, see Denson v. Beazley, 34 Tex. 191, 199.

A delusion is not necessarily a belief in something impossible in the nature of things or the circumstances of the case; but if a belief is entertained against all evidence and probability, and after argument to the contrary, it affords grounds for inferring that the person entertaining it labors under an insane delusion. Medill v. Snyder, 58 Pac. 962, 61 Kan. 15, 78 Am. St. Rep. 307.

Unchangeable belief.

Wherever a person once conceives something extravagant to exist, which has still no existence whatever but in his own heated imagination, and wherever at the same time, having once so conceived, he is incapable of being, or at least of being permanently, reasoned out of that conception, he is said to be under a delusion in the peculiar and half technical sense of the term; and the absence or presence of delusion, so understood, forms the true and only test or criterion of absent or present insanity. In short, delusion, in this sense, and insanity, are almost, if not altogether, convertible terms. Dew v. Clarke, 3 Add. 79; In re Shaw's Will (N. Y.) 2 Redf. Sur. 107, 126; In re Smith's Will, 24 N. Y. Supp. 928, 929; American Seamen's Friend Soc. v. Hopper, 33 N. Y. 619, 624; Stanton v. Wetherwax (N. Y.) 16 Barb. 259, 262; In re Mason, 14 N. Y. Supp. 434, 437, 60 Hun. 46; Bull v. Wheeler (N. Y.) 6 Dem. Sur. 123, 126; In re Lapham, 19 Misc. Rep. 71, 77, 44 N. Y. Supp. 90; Phillips v. Charter (N. Y.) 1 Dem. Sur. 533, 541; In re Jenkins' Will, 80 N. Y. Supp. 664, 665, 39 Misc. Rep. 618; State v. Jones, 50 N. H. 369, 395, 9 Am. Rep. 242; State v. Pike, 49 N. H. 399, 432, 6 Am. Rep. 533; Middleditch v. Williams, 17 Atl. 826, 829, 45 N. J. Eq. (18 Stew.) 726, 4 L. R. A. 738; Smith v. Smith, 25 Atl. 11, 12, 48 N. J. Eq. (3 Dick.) 566; Rush v. Megee, 36 Ind. 69, 80; In re McGovran's Estate, 39 Atl. 816, 817, 185 Pa. 203; In re Tittel's Estate (Cal.) Myr. Prob. Rep. 12, 14; Lucas v. Parsons, 24 Ga. 640, 651, 661, 71 Am. Dec. 147; Clements v. McGinn (Cal.) 33 Pac. 920, 921 (as cited in Re Kendrick's Estate, 62 Pac. 605, 610, 130 Cal. 360); Denson v. Beazley, 34 Tex. 191, 213; State v. Pratt (Del.) Houst. Cr. Cas. 249, 266; Sharp v. Merriam, 66 N. W. 372, 373, 108 Mich. 454.

"All delusions are not insane delusions. The difference between the two species is that one is the product of the reason, and the other a figment of the imagination." Thus, on an issue as to the insanity of testator, the question is not whether a certain view of his was sound, but whether he imagined or conceived something to exist which did not in fact exist, and which no rational person, in the absence of evidence, would have believed to have existed. In re Bennett's Estate, 51 Atl. 330, 201 Pa. 485.

Redfield speaks of a delusion as a creation purely of the imagination, such as no man can believe. Redf. Wills, 67. In Tayl. Med. Jur. c. 62, it is described as a belief in the existence of something that does not exist. The proof of the existence and influence of the delusion in any particular case may be found in the surrender of the will to imaginary directions, regarded by the victim as the directions of God, or of spirits speaking to him from another world, or to the control of an impulse due to an imaginary state of facts. The mental processes of such a person may be orderly and logical, but they rest on false assumptions. Trich's Ex'r v. Trich, 30 Atl. 1053, 1056, 165 Pa. 586.

In ordinary language a person is said to be under a delusion who entertains a false belief or opinion which he has been led to form by reason of some deception or fraud; but it is not every false or unfounded opinion which is in legal phraseology a delusion, nor is every delusion an insane delusion. If the belief or opinion has no basis in reason or probability, and is without any evidence in its support, but exists without any process of reasoning, or is a spontaneous offspring of a perverted imagination, and is adhered to against all evidence and argument, the delusion may be truly called "insane"; but if there is any evidence, however slight or inconclusive, which may have a tendency to create the belief, it cannot be said to be a delusion. In re Scott's Estate, 60 Pac. 527, 528, 128 Cal. 57.

A "delusion" is the spontaneous conception and acceptance of that as a fact which has no real existence except in his imagination, and his persistent adherence to it against all evidence. Smith v. Smith, 25 Atl. 11, 12, 48 N. J. Eq. 566. Thus a belief by a person that he could physically see inside of other persons' bodies is a delusion. Kern v. Kern, 26 Atl. 837, 842, 51 N. J. Eq. (6 Dick.) 574.

Unreasonable prejudice.

Insane delusion consists in the belief of facts which no rational person would have believed. In order that a testator may comprehend the relations which he holds to those having claims upon him, no insane delusion should influence his will. Unreasonable prejudice against relatives is not ordinarily a ground for invalidating a will, but it may be set aside where the testator's aversion is the result of an insane delusion, and his conduct cannot be explained on any other ground. Nicewander v. Nicewander, 151 Ill. 156, 157, 37 N. E. 698, 700.

DEMAND.

See "Lawfully Demanded"; "Matter in Demand"; "On Demand"; "Sum Demanded"; "Waiving Demand and Notice."

A demand is a requisition or request to do a particular thing specified under a claim of right on the part of the person requesting. Brackenridge v. State, 11 S. W. 630, 631, 27 Tex. App. 513, 4 L. R. A. 360 (citing Bouv. Law Dict.).

A demand, within the meaning of the rule that a demand must precede the bringing of replevin, where the taking of the chattel was originally lawful, does not require that the word "demand" be used in making such a demand; but it is sufficient if any words are used which are understood by both parties to be a demand. Truax v. Parvis (Del.) 32 Atl. 227, 228, 7 Houst. 330.

A demand, within the meaning of the requirement of a demand for the payment of taxes, means any intimation to the taxpayer that payment is desired. Miller v. Davis, 34 Atl. 265, 88 Me. 454.

In an action to recover money deposited by plaintiff with the defendant as a stakeholder on a wager depending on the result of an election, the court charged the jury as to what would constitute a demand by plaintiff on defendant for the money as follows: "I instruct you that no formal words are necessary to constitute a demand. Any words expressive of a prohibition to pay absolutely or conditionally are sufficient to revoke the authority of the stakeholder to pay it over." Held, that the instruction was proper. Willis v. Hooper, 9 Or. 418, 424 (citing Ivey v. Phifer, 11 Ala. 535).

1 Rev. St. 1899, § 3431, provides that a stakeholder shall be liable to the party placing a bet in his hands, both before and after the determination thereof, and delivery to the winner shall be no defense; provided, that no stakeholder shall be liable afterwards unless a demand has been made of him previous to the time agreed on for the determination of the bet. Held, that a written notice, served on a stakeholder, reciting: "I hereby notify you not to pay my part of the bet made on the election of the Governor, * * * held by you as stakeholder, made on October 19, 1900, with one R."—dated and signed by the other party to the wager, was a sufficient demand, within the statute, to charge the stakeholder. Vandolah v. McKee, 73 S. W. 233, 234, 99 Mo. App. 342.

Where a grantee of the mortgagor called on the mortgagee and asked the amount of his claim on the mortgaged estate, and was answered that he owned the whole, that he had bought it and paid for it, and, on such grantee showing his deed and again asking the amount of the claim, he was referred to the records, and, on being asked what sort of money would answer, the mortgagee replied, "Nothing but specie," and that, if money was tendered, he would do as he thought proper about taking it, and that his papers were at another town and he could not ascertain what was due on the mortgage, there was a sufficient demand and refusal to entitle such grantee to maintain an action to redeem the land from such mortgage. Willard v. Fiske, 19 Mass. (2 Pick.) 540, 544.

As actual demand.

The rule that, in order to bind an indorser, a demand must be made on the maker, means a demand actual and virtual, made at the place where the note is payable. Shaw v. Reed, 29 Mass. (12 Pick.) 132.

Debt due indicated.

In notes payable on demand, the word "demand" is not treated as a part of the contract, but is used to show that the debt is due. McMullen v. Rafferty, 89 N. Y. 456, 459. But, if payable at any period of time after demand, the weight of authority would seem to favor the doctrine that an actual demand must be made to fix the period of maturity; but where several notes were given, some of which were payable on demand, others one day after date, and others one day after demand, the word "demand," in those made payable one day after demand, will be construed in the sense of indicating that the debt is due. Smith v. Ijama, 24 N. Y. Supp. 202, 205, 70 Hun, 155.

Examination of bank's books.

Where a bill or note is made payable at a particular bank, and the bank itself is the holder, an examination of the books of the bank on the day when the bill or note becomes due is a sufficient demand, and in an action upon the instrument no other demand need be averred or proved. Bank of United States v. Smith, 24 U. S. (11 Wheat.) 171, 177, 6 L. Ed. 443.

Notice of filing of petition.

While a notice that a treasurer would file a petition on a certain day to collect certain taxes is not technically a demand for the payment of such taxes, but a notice of the commencement of an action, yet, where no form has been prescribed for such demand, such notice will be held sufficient. Bell v. Stevens, 90 N. W. 87, 88, 116 Iowa, 451.

Notification by mail.

"Demand," as used in the statement of the rule that, in order to charge an indorser of a note, a demand must be made on the maker at maturity, means a demand made by the holder or his agent, accompanied by a presentment of the note; and hence a notification to the maker through the post office is not a sufficient demand, when the maker's residence is supposed to be ascertained. Stuckert v. Anderson (Pa.) 1 Whart. 116, 118.

As personal demand.

Where one promised to deliver specific articles when called for, the demand need not be personal, since, if a personal demand were required, it would always be in the power of the party to elude a demand, and thus avoid his responsibility; but a demand at a party's dwelling house in his absence is sufficient. Mason v. Briggs, 16 Mass. 453, 454.

Presentation of account for fees.

The presentation by a county judge of an account in writing for fees against the county to the commissioners' court, accompanied by a certificate that the account was correct, was a demand, within the meaning of Pen. Code, art. 240, subjecting to a fine any officer who should willfully demand higher fees than those allowed by law. Brackenridge v. State, 11 S. W. 630, 631, 27 Tex. App. 513, 4 L. R. A. 360.

DEMAND (Legal Obligation).

See "Contingent Demand"; "Disputed Demand"; "Lawful Claim or Demand"; "Legal Demand"; "Money Demand"; "Reciprocal Demand"; "Unliquidated Demand."

All demands, see "All."

Liquidated demand, see "Liquidate."

Stale demand, see "Stale."

A demand is a claim; a legal obligation; a thing or amount claimed to be due. Rosser v. Bunn, 66 Ala. 89, 93.

According to Lord Coke the word "demand" is the largest word in the law, except "claim," and a release of demands discharges all sorts of rights and titles, conditions before or after breach, executions, appeals, rents of all kinds, covenants, annuities, contracts, recognizances, statutes, commons, etc. Vedder v. Vedder (N. Y.) 1 Denio, 257, 261.

A demand is a claim; a legal obligation. "Demand" is a word of art, of an extent greater in its signification than any other word, except "claim." A release of all demands is in general a release of all covenants, real or personal, conditions, whether broken or not, annuities, obligations, contracts, and the like. State v. Baxter, 38 Ark. 462, 467.

"Demand," as used in Code, § 3591, providing that in appeal cases "no new demand or counterclaim can be introduced into a case after it comes into the circuit court, except by mutual consent," means a claim or legal obligation, and relates to the subject of the suit and the remedy sought. Hollen v. Davis, 13 N. W. 413, 414, 59 Iowa, 444, 44 Am. Rep. 688.

An assignment of all the assignor's "goods, chattels, wares, merchandise, rights, credits, notes, accounts, and demands" does not pass the assignor's interest in a sum of money borrowed by him and in course of transmission from the lender at the time of making the assignment. Sheldon v. Dodge (N. Y.) 4 Denio, 217.

The term "demands," within the meaning of a deed conveying all debts, dues, and demands, real, personal, and mixed, which are due and owing or of right belonging to the grantor by virtue of inheritance, legacies, bonds, notes, book debts, or otherwise, passes real estate. Though the broad construction of the word "demands" might be confined to releases which discharge, and not conveyances which charge, yet still, as it is coupled with the word "real," and with words of inheritance, it shows a strong intention to dispose of the realty. McWilliams v. Martin (Pa.) 12 Serg. & R. 269, 271, 14 Am. Dec. 688.

A conditional sale is one in which the seller retains the title as security, so that, upon failure of the purchaser to pay the purchase money, he may replevy the property, and thereby defeat the sale arising out of plaintiff's demand. Under Acts 1858, § 2918, providing for a set-off by defendant of any matter "arising out of plaintiff's demand," or "out of the original consideration of any written instrument," it is held that these phrases do not mean all rights that may be asserted, of whatsoever nature, by either party, to the property, or concerning the property, which was the subject of the dealing of the parties. In the first expression quoted, the word "demand" means the assertion of a right to recover a sum of money from the defendant, and subsequently the same ideas are conveyed by the word "consideration" in the second expression. Blair v. A. Johnson & Sons (Tenn.) 76 S. W. 912, 914.

Assessment on stockholder.

Whenever the words "claim," "demand," and "liability" have been the subject of judicial construction, it has always been agreed that they have a broader significance than the word "debt"; and hence an assessment on a stockholder, made after an assignment for creditors, is provable as a claim or demand against the assigned estate. Hill v. Graham, 53 Pac. 1060, 1063, 11 Colo. App. 536.

Claim distinguished.

A demand is a peremptory claim to a thing or right. It differs from a claim, in that it presupposes that there is no defense or doubt about the question of right. Demand will not admit of delay, but is an insistence on immediate observance, while claim, on the other hand, implies that the right is or may be doubtful, and that negotiation shall be had to determine the same. Prigg v. Pennsylvania, 41 U. S. (16 Pet.) 539, 573, 575, 10 L. Ed. 1060.

As claim arising on contract.

Under statutes requiring demands against a city or town to be presented within a certain time, it has been held that the word "demand" includes claims arising in tort, as well as on contract. Pulitzer v. City of New York, 62 N. Y. Supp. 587, 48 App. Div. 6. Contra, see Vogel v. City of Antigo, 51 N. W. 1008, 81 Wis. 642; Mason v. City of Ashland, 74 N. W. 357, 358, 98 Wis. 540. The term as so used is sufficiently broad to include claims for torts as well as on contract, yet the purpose of the act being that the claim should be audited, which would not apply to claims for torts, the act does not require presentation of a claim for damages for the maintenance of a nuisance. Adams v. City of Modesto, 63 Pac. 1083, 181 Cal. 501.

Under a statute making stockholders of a corporation liable in certain instances for the debts and demands of the corporation, it is held that the word "debt" is to be regarded as limited to claims arising out of contracts, but that the word "demand" by itself will include a claim for damages arising out of a wrong of the corporation. Heacock & Heacock v. Sherman (N. Y.) 14 Wend. 58, 59; Kelly v. Clark, 53 Pac. 959, 972, 21 Mont. 291, 42 L. R. A. 621, 69 Am. St. Rep. 668.

Gen. St. c. 118, § 25, providing that all demands against a debtor for or on account of goods or chattels wrongfully obtained, taken, or withheld from him may be proved and allowed as debts, will be construed to include that part of the damages claimed by a plaintiff for breaking and entering his close by the defendant which is for the value of goods wrongfully taken at the time of such breach or entry. Bickford v. Barnard, 90 Mass. (8 Allen) 314, 315.

"Demand," as used in Ten Pound Act, § 9, providing that defendant may plead or set off his account or judgment against the plaintiff, includes all matters arising on contract. McCumber v. Goodrich (N. Y.) 1 Johns. 56, 58.

An instrument executed by plaintiff to defendant, who had made a tortious entry on the lands of the former and caused a nuisance thereon, which shows a receipt from defendant in full of all demands, will include all causes of action arising from damages caused by such a nuisance. Vedder v. Vedder (N. Y.) 1 Denio, 257, 261.

As used in Rev. St. c. 13, §§ 40, 42, providing that an appeal may be taken from the disallowance of any demand against a county by the board of supervisors, the word "demand" means only those demands which arise in some matter of debt and credit between the party, either on the score of contract or some fiduciary relation, and does not embrace a claim for taxes paid through the wrongful or illegal conduct of the assessor. Stringham v. Winnebago County Sup'rs, 24 Wis. 594, 602.

"Demand," as used in Act N. Y. Feb. 17, 1848, declaring that, if any person have a judgment against a corporation, he may sue any stockholder in any court, etc., provided that no stockholder shall be obliged to pay more in the whole than the amount of the stock he may hold in said company at the time the debt accrued, while undoubtedly broad enough, if it stood alone, to embrace claims arising from torts, yet, the term, being used in connection with the provision making the stockholders jointly and severally liable for the payment of all debts contracted by the corporation or their agents, and the liability being new and unknown to the common law, must be taken in a more restricted sense, and as so used is applicable to claims arising ex contractu only. Chase v. Curtis, 5 Sup. Ct. 554, 559, 113 U. S. 452, 28 L. Ed. 1038.

Debt distinguished.

In ordinary legal usage, the words "debt" and "demand" are of a kindred meaning, but "demand" is a term of much more comprehensive signification than "debt." The term "debt" imports a sum of money owing upon a contract, express or implied, while the term "demand" embraces rightful claims, whether founded upon a contract, a tort, or a superior right of property. In re Denny (N. Y.) 2 Hill, 220, 222. The statute which enumerates the classes of demands for which attachments may issue in the first place authorizes the issue of the writ "to enforce the collection of a debt"; next, for any "moneyed demand the amount of which can be certainly ascertained." Code 1886, § 2929; Code, § 3687. In such connection the meaning of the words "debt" and "demand" is plain. They are used to describe certain classes of rights of action. Neither of them covers anything more than what is due to the plaintiff in attachment—the amount which he is entitled to recover. We think it is plain that the phrase "amount of the demand," as used in the statute fixing the sheriff's commissions when the attachment suit is settled, means the amount which the plaintiff was entitled to be paid by the defendant. United States Rolling Stock Co. v. Clark, 10 South. 917, 95 Ala. 322.

Interest included.

Where the trust in a deed of assignment was to pay to the creditors the amount of their respective demands in full, the word "demands" included everything which the creditor would have been entitled to recover by suit, and hence it meant interest, as well as principal. Scott v. Morris (Pa.) 9 Serg. & R. 123, 124; In re Fay, 27 N. Y. Supp. 910, 912, 6 Misc. Rep. 462; Appeal of Murphy (Pa.) 6 Watts & S. 223, 226.

"Debts, dues, and demands" as the terms are used in a discharge of all debts, dues, and demands, include a special promise to pay the interest upon an assigned note. Howel v. Seaman (Conn.) 1 Root, 383.

As legal demand.

1 Gav. & H. Rev. St. c. 71, § 23, relating to taxation, and providing that personal estate includes, among other things, the value of all demands against any person or body corporate, must be construed to mean only such legal demands as the law will recognize and enforce. Lamb v. Rawles, 33 Ind. 386, 388.

License tax.

"Taxes, debts, dues, and demands due the state," as used in Act March 30, 1871, providing that coupons on state bonds should be receivable for all taxes, debts, dues, and demands due the state, includes the "charges or assessments made by law as a condition precedent to obtaining license for pursuing a business or profession." Royall v. Virginia, 6 Sup. Ct. 510, 513, 116 U. S. 572, 29 L. Ed. 735.

DEMAND AGAINST ESTATE.

Gen. St. 1865, c. 127, § 1, providing that appeals may be allowed from the decisions of the courts having probate jurisdiction on all "demands" against an estate exceeding $10, cannot be construed to include the claim of an executor of an estate for costs, attorney's fees, and commission which accrued in a proceeding instituted by a plaintiff against the executor to recover her absolute property in the estate of the deceased. Baker v. Schoeneman, 41 Mo. 391, 394.

"Demand," within the meaning of Rev. St. 1894, § 507, relative to the admission of testimony in actions founded upon a contract or demand against the estate of one deceased, has been held to be one of broad meaning, and it may well be held to apply to an action by or against devisees in relation to a will of the ancestor. Suits to contest a will come clearly within the spirit and meaning of this section, if not within its express letter. McDonald v. McDonald, 41 N. E. 336, 337, 346, 142 Ind. 55.

The terms "claim or demand," as used in section 5057, Rev. St., providing that parties to an action against an executor or administrator upon a claim or demand against the estate of a deceased person are incompetent to testify as to any matter or fact occurring before the death of such person, embrace all rights of action for the establishment of a trust in land as well as claims or demands for debts or damages against the estate of the deceased person. Rice v. Rigley, 61 Pac. 290, 296, 7 Idaho, 115.

Rev. St. 1879, c. 1, art. 9, providing that all demands against deceased persons shall be divided into classes and paid in a certain order, should be construed to include taxes on the personal estate of a decedent, whether they accrued before or after his death. State ex rel. Ziegenhein v. Tittman, 15 S. W. 936, 937, 103 Mo. 553.

Acts 1891, c. 123, amending Gen. St. 1878, c. 77, § 2, authorizing the maintenance of an action for the negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate, provides that any demands for the support of the deceased and funeral expenses shall be first allowed and deducted from the recovery. Held, that the words "demands for the support of the deceased" must be construed as referring only to the expenses of his last sickness—that is, during the time, if any, that elapsed between the injury and his death. Sykora v. J. I. Case Threshing Mach. Co., 60 N. W. 1008, 1009, 59 Minn. 130.

The word "demands," as used in a statute authorizing the county court to hear and determine all suits and other proceedings against executors or administrators upon demands against the estate of the testator or intestate, includes claims based on alleged trespasses by the deceased. Mayberry v. McClurg, 51 Mo. 256, 261.

DEMAND AND RECONVENTION.

The term, "demand and reconvention," in the law of Louisiana is equivalent to the term "counterclaim," as used in our law, and to reconvene is equivalent to interposing a counterclaim in the answer. Such pleading is denominated a "plea of reconvention." McLeod v. Bertschy, 33 Wis. 176, 177, 14 Am. Rep. 755.

DEMAND FOR RENT.

A demand for rent is nothing more or less than a notice that payment is required to be made. Pendill v. Union Min. Co., 31 N. W. 100, 102, 64 Mich. 172.

DEMAND IN WRITING.

A paper addressed to a railroad company, and reciting that payment of certain interest coupons of its mortgage bonds had been demanded and refused, and that the holder would look to the company for payment thereof, is substantially a "demand made in writing," within the meaning of a provision in the mortgage, requiring a demand to be made in writing, etc. Pennsylvania Co. for Insurance on Lives and Granting Annuities v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. (U. S.) 69 Fed. 482, 483.

DEMAND SOUNDING IN DAMAGES.

See "Sounding in Damages."

DEMANDS DUE.

"Demands due," in the commercial and popular acceptance of the words, are debts presently payable. Ming v. Wollfolk, 3 Mont. 380, 385.

DEMENTIA.

Dementia is that form of insanity characterized by mental weakness and decrepitude and total inability to reason. In the case of old men it is called "senile dementia," and it indicates the breaking down of the mental powers in advance of bodily decay. The mind dwells only in the past, and the thoughts succeed one another without any obvious association. The Century Dictionary defines it to be an "extremely low condition of the mental function; profound general mental incapacity." Pyott v. Pyott, 90 Ill. App. 210, 221.

"Dementia is that form of insanity where the mental derangement is accompanied with a general enfeeblement of the faculties. It is characterized by forgetfulness, inability to follow any train of thought, and indifference to passing events. In dementia, says Ray, a celebrated writer on medical jurisprudence, the mind is susceptible of only feeble and transitory impressions, and manifests but little reflection even on these. They come and go without leaving any trace of their presence behind them. The attention is incapable of more than a momentary effort, one idea succeeding another with but little connection or coherence. The mind has lost the power of comparison, and abstract ideas are utterly beyond its grasp. The memory is peculiarly weak, events the most recent and most nearly connected with the individual being rapidly forgotten. The language of the demented is not only incoherent, but they are much inclined to repeat isolated words and phrases without the slightest meaning." Hall v. Unger (U. S.) 11 Fed. Cas. 261, 263.

"We have not been able to discover that any line is drawn by medical experts between weakness of mind and dementia, and we trace no indication of such line drawn with any reference to the capacity to transact business. It seems not an uncommon opinion of medical men and others that, if insanity is clearly proved to exist in any degree, the party can no longer be safely regarded as capable of transacting any business. We are unable to adopt this opinion, because we think there is abundant evidence that the species of insanity called 'monomania' may be limited to certain subjects, and the mind and memory be greatly impaired, and yet the person be capable of disposing of his property; and, where an affidavit states that testator was in a state of 'dementia' during the later years of his life, the term would be understood to mean an impaired state of the mental powers and feebleness of the mind caused by disease, and not accompanied by delusion or uncontrollable impulse." Dennett v. Dennett, 44 N. H. 531, 537, 84 Am. Dec. 97.

Dementia is "a form of insanity where the person afflicted is rendered incapable of reasoning in consequence of functional disorder of the brain, not congenital or born with the person." People v. Lake (N. Y.) 2 Parker, Cr. R. 215, 218.

Dementia is a state of enfeeblement of the mind or impairment of the mind, and is usually the result of other forms of insanity. In re Shaw's Will (N. Y.) 2 Redf. Sur. 107, 132.

DEMENTIA AFFECTATA.

The term "dementia affectata" was used by Sir Matthew Hale in his Pleas of the Crown to designate drunkenness, which he considered to be a species of madness. "This doth deprive man of the use of reason, and puts many men into a perfect but temporary phrensy; but, by the laws of England, such a person shall have no privilege by this voluntary contracted madness, but shall have the same judgment as if he were in his right senses." Cronwell v. State (Tenn.) Mart. & Y. 147, 156.

DEMESNE.

See "Ancient Demesne."

DEMIJOHN.

A demijohn is a glass vessel with a large body and a small neck, inclosed in wicker-work. It is not synonymous with "bottle," within Rev. St. § 2504, Schedule D, declaring that all spirituous liquors imported in bottles shall be packed in packages containing not less than one dozen bottles in each package, and all such bottles shall pay an additional duty of three cents for each bottle. United States v. Ninety Demijohns of Rum (U. S.) 8 Fed. 485, 487.

DEMISE.

The word "demise," says Coke, "is applied to an estate, either in fee simple, fee tail, or for a term of life, and so commonly is taken in many writs." Krider v. Lafferty (Pa.) 1 Whart. 302, 314, 315.

"Demise" technically means a lease for a term of years. Voorhees v. Presbyterian Church of Amsterdam (N. Y.) 5 How. Prac. 53, 71 (citing Bouv. Law Dict.).

A demise is a conveyance or transfer of an estate either in fee, for life, or for years. Gilmore v. Hamilton, 83 Ind. 196, 198 (citing Webst. Dict.).

Where the word "demise" is employed in a deed it is not used to designate the quantity of estate intended to be conveyed, but merely for the purpose of passing title to an estate described by other words introduced for that purpose. Krider v. Lafferty (Pa.) 1 Whart. 303, 314, 315, 316.

The words "demise and grant" in a deed will make a good deed of bargain and sale if made for a pecuniary consideration or one of pecuniary value, and though ever so small, even a barleycorn. Krider v. Lafferty (Pa.) 1 Whart. 302, 314, 315 (citing Shep. Touch. 222).

"Demise," as used in Act March 27, 1801 (providing for the incorporation of religious societies) § 4, authorizing their trustees to purchase and hold real and personal estate, and to demise, lease, and improve the same for the use of the congregation, means a lease for a term of years in consideration of rent, which is a contract for the possession and profits of lands and tenements on the one side, and a recompense of rent or income on the other, or a conveyance of lands to one for life or years or at will in consideration of a rent or other recompense. Voorhees v. Presbyterian Church of Amsterdam (N. Y.) 5 How. Prac. 53, 62.

Covenant for quiet enjoyment.

The word "demise" in a lease imports a covenant for quiet enjoyment. Maeder v. City of Carondelet, 26 Mo. 112, 115; Mershon v. Williams, 44 Atl. 211, 214, 63 N. J. Law, 398; Williams v. Burrell, 1 C. B. 402, 429; Burwell v. Jackson, 9 N. Y. (5 Seld.) 535, 541 (quoting Grannis v. Clark [N. Y.] 8 Cow. 36); Gallup v. Albany Ry. (N. Y.) 7 Lans. 471, 479; Tone v. Brace (N. Y.) 1 Clark, Ch. 503, 506; Wells v. Mason, 5 Ill. (4 Scam.) 84, 90; Crouch v. Fowle, 9 N. H. 219, 222, 32 Am. Dec. 350; Wilkinson v. Clauson, 12 N. W. 147, 148, 29 Minn. 911; Coogan v. Parker, 2 S. C. (2 Rich.) 255, 267, 16 Am. Rep. 659; Ware v. Lithgow, 71 Me. 62, 64.

The word "demise," in the operative words of a conveyance in a tax deed made by the officers of a municipality, does not import a covenant for quiet enjoyment. Meday v. Borough of Rutherford, 48 Atl. 523, 530, 65 N. J. Law (36 Vroom) 645.

"Demise," as used in a lease, cannot be construed as importing a covenant for quiet enjoyment, there being other provisions in the lease which show a different intent of the parties. O'Connor v. Daily, 109 Mass. 235, 236. Though the word "demise" in a lease implies a covenant for quiet enjoyment, it will have a different meaning, and the implication will not be raised, where it is expressly stipulated in the lease that nothing therein contained shall be construed to imply a covenant for quiet enjoyment. Maeder v. City of Carondelet, 26 Mo. 112, 115.

From the word "demise" in a lease under seal the law implies a covenant; in a lease not under seal, a contract for title to the estate merely; but it does not imply a contract for any particular state of the property at the time of the demise, or that the property shall continue fit for the purpose for which it was demised. Foster v. Peyser, 63 Mass. (9 Cush.) 242, 246, 57 Am. Dec. 43.

Covenant of power to give lease.

In a lease, the term "demise" imports a covenant on the part of the lessor of good right and title to make the lease. Crouch v. Fowle, 9 N. H. 219, 222, 32 Am. Dec. 350; Ware v. Lithgow, 71 Me. 62, 64.

In the charter of a railroad company it was empowered to have, purchase, etc., lands, tenements, goods, etc., of whatsoever kind, sufficient for the construction of banking houses and the erection of the railroad, and the same to sell, grant, demise, alien, or dispose of. It was held that the word "demise," thus used in the enumeration of the powers of the company, meant technically to lease for a term of years, and thus gave the company power to lease its road. Georgia R. & Banking Co. v. Maddox, 42 S. E. 315, 319, 116 Ga. 64.

The word "demise," when used in a lease for years, implies a covenant of power in the lessor to give the lease. Grannis v. Clark (N. Y.) 8 Cow. 36, 39.

Lease and letting distinguished.

See "Lease."

Of vessel.

Affreightment distinguished, see "Charter Party."

A charter party, by the terms of which the general owner did not part with the possession, command, and navigation of the vessel, and the language used shows no intent to transfer such possession, command, and control, does not constitute a demise of the vessel. The Nicaragua (U. S.) 71 Fed. 723, 725.

When a ship is let to another for a period of time, and the owner, during that time, has nothing to do with the appointment of her officers and crew or with the working or management of her, that is called a "demise" or letting of the ship, and the charterer becomes responsible for her navigation. Bramble v. Culmer (U. S.) 78 Fed. 497, 501, 24 C. C. A. 182.

DEMISED PREMISES.

A statute which allows distress by landlord upon the goods and chattels on the demised premises refers to the premises occupied by the tenant, as delivered to him to be used for specified purposes, and does not authorize a levy upon a piano standing upon the street in front of the house. Robelen v. National Bank of Wilmington & Brandywine (Del.) 41 Atl. 80, 82, 1 Marv. 346.

2 Wds. & P.—62

DEMISI.

At common law a covenant for title was implied from the word "demisi" in a lease. Koch v. Hustis, 87 N. W. 834, 835, 113 Wis. 599.

The words "dedi," "concessi," and "demisi," when used in a conveyance of real estate at common law, imported a covenant in law. Kinney v. Watts (N. Y.) 14 Wend. 38, 40.

DEMOCRATIC.

In a will providing that testator's property should be used for the special benefit of the worthy, deserving, poor, white, American, Protestant, Democratic orphans residing in such town, the term "Democratic orphans" means, when applied to an orphan not of sufficient age to have acquired a character, one who had a Democratic father, for children in common speech are not said to have Democratic or other political principles. Beardsley v. Selectmen of Bridgeport, 3 Atl. 557, 558, 53 Conn. 489, 55 Am. Rep. 152.

Beginning to demolish, see "Beginning."

DEMONSTRATION.

"Demonstration" has several meanings. It is an expression of the feeling by outward signs; a manifestation; a show. "Effort" means an exertion of strength; strenuous endeavors; laborious attempts; struggle directed to the accomplishment of an object. There is no word in the English language, we think, better understood by the people generally than "effort," and when told that a person threatened to kill the defendant, and at the time of the killing made such an effort and demonstration as to induce the defendant to believe that he intended to execute such threat, the jury must have understood the court to mean an attempt to execute them. This means something more than a demonstration or an act manifesting an intention, and where the threats were to take the life of the defendant, an "effort" means an attempt to kill defendant. Miles v. State, 18 Tex. App. 156, 171.

In proof.

"Demonstration," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 1826, declaring that the law does not require demonstration of the truth of facts, means such degree of proof as excludes the possibility of error or produces absolute certainty; moral certainty only being required, or that degree of proof which produces conviction in an unprejudiced mind. Treadwell v. Whittier, 22 Pac. 266, 268, 80

Cal. 574, 5 L. R. A. 498, 13 Am. St. Rep. 175.

The amount of proof required in an action for negligence need not be of that high degree called "demonstration," which excludes all possibility of error. It must be of sufficient cogency to make it appear that defendant did or omitted to do some act amounting to a breach of duty. Boetgen v. New York & H. R. Co., 50 N. Y. Supp. 331, 332.

DEMONSTRATIVE LEGACY.

Specific legacy distinguished, see "Specific Legacy."

A legacy is demonstrative when the particular fund or personal property is pointed out from which it is to be taken or paid. Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1071; Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 2802. If such fund or property fails, in whole or in part, resort may be had to the general assets, as in case of a general legacy. Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 1820, subd. 2; Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 1357, subd. 2.

A demonstrative legacy is a legacy made payable out of a particular fund, named or demonstrated in the will. Chester County Hospital v. Hayden, 34 Atl. 877, 878, 83 Md. 104; Adair v. Adair (N. D.) 90 N. W. 804, 806; Harper v. Bibb, 47 Ala. 547, 554; Tanton v. Keller, 47 N. E. 376, 378, 167 Ill. 129.

The term "demonstrative legacies" is used to designate legacies in which the sum given is to be made good out of the general estate, upon the failure of a particular fund which is primarily holden for its satisfaction. Boomhower v. Babbitt's Adm'r, 31 Atl. 838, 839, 67 Vt. 327.

A demonstrative legacy is in the nature of a general legacy, with a certain sum pointed out for its payment, as a gift of $1,000 to be paid out of the fund due by A.; and, if the fund thus designated fails, the legatee is entitled to be paid out of the general assets belonging to the estate. Giddings v. Seward, 16 N. Y. 365, 367; Appeal of Welch, 28 Pa. 363, 366.

A demonstrative legacy is a bequest of a sum of money payable out of a particular fund or thing. It is a pecuniary legacy given generally, but with a demonstration of a particular fund as a source of its payment. It is therefore equivalent to or in the nature of a devise or bequest of so much or such a part of a fund or thing specified. Roquet v. Eldridge, 20 N. E. 733, 734, 118 Ind. 147.

A legacy of quantity is ordinarily a general legacy; but there are legacies of quantity in the nature of specific legacies, as of so much money, with reference to a particular fund for payment. This kind of legacy is called by the civilians a "demonstrative legacy," and it is so far general, and differs so much in effect from one properly specific, that, if the fund be called in or fail, the legatee will not be deprived of his legacy, but be permitted to receive it out of the general assets; yet the legacy is so far specific that it will not be liable to abate with general legacies upon a deficiency of assets. Kenaday v. Sinnott, 21 Sup. Ct. 233, 237, 179 U. S. 606, 45 L. Ed. 339; Gelbach v. Shively, 10 Atl. 247, 67 Md. 498; Morriss v. Garland's Adm'r, 78 Va. 215, 223; Darden v. Orgain, 45 Tenn. (5 Cold.) 211, 215; Johnson v. Conover, 35 Atl. 291, 293, 54 N. J. Eq. 333; Crawford v. McCarthy, 54 N. E. 277, 278, 159 N. Y. 514; Appeal of Armstrong, 63 Pa. (13 P. F. Smith) 312, 316; Merriam v. Merriam, 83 N. W. 162, 164, 80 Minn. 254; Florence v. Sands (N. Y.) 4 Redf. Sur. 206, 209.

A demonstrative legacy is a bequest of money or other fungible goods, charged upon a particular fund in such way as not to amount to a gift of the corpus of the fund, or to evince an intention to relieve the general estate from liability in case the fund fail, and so described as to be indistinguishable from other things of the same kind. Kelly v. Richardson, 13 South. 785, 790, 100 Ala. 584.

A demonstrative legacy is one which partakes so far of the nature of a specific legacy that the security referred to in the bequest, if in existence and belonging to the testator at the time of his death, is set apart as a primary fund for the payment of the legacy. Dunning v. Dunning, 31 N. Y. Supp. 719, 722, 32 Hun. 462.

A demonstrative legacy is a bequest of a certain sum of money, stock, or other like thing payable out of a particular fund or security. A demonstrative legacy partakes of the nature of a general legacy by bequeathing a specified amount, and also of a specific legacy by pointing out the fund from which the payment is to be made, but differs from a specific legacy in the particular that, if the fund pointed out for the payment of the legacy fails, recourse will be had to the general assets. Baptist Female University of North Carolina v. Borden, 44 S. E. 47, 51, 132 N. C. 476.

A demonstrative legacy is where the thing or money is not specified or distinguished from all others of the same kind, but a particular fund is pointed out for its payment. Under this definition a bequest of a certain sum "in Confederate state bonds," is not a demonstrative, but a general, legacy. It designates the article from which payment is to be made, not the source or fund from which the means of payment are to be derived. Had it been a legacy of a certain sum "out of my Confederate state bonds," or "to be paid from my Confederate state bonds," the rule might have been different. Gilmer's Legatees v. Gilmer's Ex'rs, 42 Ala. 9, 16.

A demonstrative legacy is the bequest of a certain sum of money, with the direction that it shall be paid out of a particular fund. It differs from a specific legacy in this, that if the fund out of which it is to be paid fails, for any reason, it is nevertheless entitled to come on the estate as a general legacy; and it differs from a general legacy in this, that it does not abate in that class, but in the class of specific legacies. A bequest of $2,000 of the "South Ward Loan of Chester, Pa.," by a person owning $10,000 worth of bonds known by that designation, is a demonstrative legacy, and is therefore not adeemed by the payment of the bonds before the testator's death. Ives v. Canby (U. S.) 48 Fed. 718, 721.

A legacy of quantity is ordinarily a general legacy; but there are legacies of quantity in the nature of specific legacies, as of so much money with reference to a particular fund for payment. This kind of legacy is called by the civilians a "demonstrative legacy," and it is so far general, and differs so much in effect from one properly specific, that, if the fund be called in or fail, the legatee will not be deprived of his legacy, but be permitted to receive it. The giving to each of two sons of a certain portion of the fund, and to both the whole, is indicative of a specific legacy, and where the testator added, "providing the said amount and interest is collected" from the fund designated, there can be no doubt that the legacies were specific, and not demonstrative. Appeal of Smith, 103 Pa. 559, 561.

A legacy of money is demonstrative when the gift is so made as clearly to show the testator's intention that the legatee shall certainly receive the amount bequeathed. Methodist Episcopal Church in Center of Stanford v. Hebard, 51 N. Y. Supp. 546, 549, 28 App. Div. 548 (citing Watrous v. Smith [N. Y.] 7 Hun, 544, and cases cited therein).

Where a testator provided a fund to furnish a certain income for his wife, and that securities be selected sufficient to secure the result, the selection of such securities would not constitute a specific legacy, the income of which must be necessarily diminished upon diminution of the producing capacity of such fund, but it is a demonstrative legacy. Merriam v. Merriam, 83 N. W. 162, 164, 80 Minn. 254.

Bonds or stock.

A gift in a will of money in government bonds is not sufficient to make the legacy demonstrative, for the reason that it is not pointed out in the will that the money is to be taken out of any particular fund belonging to the estate. This latter qualification is an essential element of a demonstrative legacy. In re Van Vliet, 25 N. Y. Supp. 722, 723, 5 Misc. Rep. 169.

Where a will directed that a legatee be paid a certain amount out of the proceeds of certain property, and in addition, out of such proceeds, bank stock, and other personal property, a sum sufficient to make such person equal in amount to another person, the legacy was a demonstrative one. Appeal of Armstrong, 63 Pa. (13 P. F. Smith) 312, 316.

Where a testator directed the setting apart of $50,000 worth, at par value, of his bank and other paying stocks, interest and dividends therefrom to be devoted to the support of a certain person, such a legacy is a demonstrative one. Morris v. Garland's Adm'r, 78 Va. 215, 223.

Proceeds of land.

A legacy of a certain sum of money, to be paid out of the proceeds of the sale of certain land, which the executor was directed to sell, was a demonstrative legacy, and drew interest only from the time of the receipt of the purchase money by the executor. Darden v. Orgain, 45 Tenn. (5 Cold.) 211, 215.

Share of estate.

Where a will bequeathed to testator's brother and sister legacies of $1,000 each "out of the portion or share of my father's estate that may come to me," such legacies are demonstrative legacies. Gelbach v. Shively, 10 Atl. 247, 67 Md. 498.

DEMURRAGE.

Every improper detention of a vessel may be considered a demurrage, and compensation in that name be obtained for it. Demurrage is only an extended freight or reward to the vessel in compensation of earnings she is improperly caused to lose. Sprague v. West (U. S.) 22 Fed. Cas. 970, 972; Donaldson v. McDowell (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 887, 888; The J. E. Owen (U. S.) 54 Fed. 185, 186; Nelissen v. Jesup (U. S.) 30 Fed. 138, 139; Hawgood v. 1,310 Tons of Coal (U. S.) 21 Fed. 681, 686; Jesson v. Solly, 4 Taunt. 52, 55; Falbenburg v. Clark, 11 R. I. 278, 283. Where, however, demurrage had been earned before the execution of a bottomry bond, it could not be held to be freight, within the meaning of a clause in the bond covering the vessel, tackle, and freight as per charter party. Brett v. Van Praag, 31 N. E. 761, 763, 157 Mass. 182.

To say that "demurrage is only an extended freight" is incorrect, for it includes also compensation for the hazard of all such injuries and losses as may be caused by departure in point of time from the regular course of the intended voyage. Under a contract of affreightment containing no provision that the payment of demurrage should depend upon the earning of freight, demurrage for extra detention at an intermediate port of an entire voyage became absolutely due at such port, and recoverable, though the vessel was lost in the return voyage. Caroline A. White (U. S.) 5 Fed. Cas. 94, 95.

Demurrage is the compensation provided for in a contract of affreightment for the detention of a vessel beyond the time agreed on for loading or unloading. Fisher v. Abeel (N. Y.) 44 How. Prac. 432, 440.

In the popular sense, "demurrage" covers not only what is strictly known to the law as such, but also damages for detention when such damages are recoverable. Donnell v. Amoskeag Mfg. Co., 118 Fed. 10, 11, 55 C. C. A. 178.

"Demurrage" means a sum of money due by express contract for the detention of a vessel in loading or unloading one or more days beyond the time allowed for that purpose by the charter party. As it is a certain sum due by force of an express contract, general assumpsit will lie for it. Damages in the nature of demurrage are recoverable for detention beyond a reasonable time in unloading only, and, where there is no express stipulation to pay demurrage, they are for a breach of the implied contract of the shipper. Wordin v. Bemis, 32 Conn. 268, 273, 85 Am. Dec. 255.

Demurrage, as is remarked by Heath, J., in Jesson v. Solly, 4 Taunt. 53, is only an extended freight, and the liability for freight and for demurrage stands upon the same grounds. Damages in the nature of demurrage, observes Butler, J., in Wordin v. Bemis, 32 Conn. 268, 273, 85 Am. Dec. 255, are recoverable for detention beyond a reasonable time in unloading only, and when there is no express stipulation to pay demurrage. They are in the nature of demurrage because they are for the detention of the vessel, and measured by a debt, like demurrage, and are damages because they are recoverable for a breach in an implied contract of the shipper that he will receive the goods in a reasonable time. Hall v. Barker, 64 Me. 339, 343.

Demurrage is merely an allowance for compensation for the delay or detention of a vessel. It is often a matter of contract, but not necessarily so. The very circumstance that in ordinary commercial voyages a particular sum is deemed by the parties a fair compensation for delay is a reason why it is and should be adopted as a measure of compensation in cases ex delicto. The Apollon, 22 U. S. (9 Wheat.) 362, 378, 6 L. Ed. 111.

Demurrage is a charge payable to a vessel or carrier in compensation of the earnings she is improperly caused to lose either by delay or other act of the charterer. Two Hundred and Seventy-Five Tons of Mineral Phosphates (U. S.) 9 Fed. 209, 210.

The merchant usually covenants to load and unload the ship within a limited number of days after she is ready to receive the cargo and after arrival at the destined point. Frequently, also, it is stipulated that the ship shall, if required, wait a further time to load and unload, or to sail with convoy, for which the merchant covenants to pay a daily sum. This delay, and the payment to be made for it, are both called "demurrage." Brown v. Ralston (Va.) 4 Rand. 504, 510.

It is usual in charter parties to insert an agreement that a specified number of days shall be allowed for loading and unloading, or for one of those operations, and that it shall be lawful for the freighter to detain the vessel for these purposes a further specified time on the payment of a daily sum. A contract to the same effect is often inserted in the bill of lading where goods are sent in a general ship. This delay and the payment agreed on are called "demurrage." Cross v. Beard, 26 N. Y. 85, 88, 89.

Demurrage is a loss of profits or of the use of a vessel pending repairs or other detention arising from a collision or maritime tort. The Conqueror, 17 Sup. Ct. 510, 516, 166 U. S. 110, 41 L. Ed. 937.

DEMURRER.

See "General Demurrer"; "Speaking Demurrer"; "Special Demurrer."
Demurrer as trial, see "Trial."

A demurrer is an allegation of the defendant, which, admitting the matters of fact alleged by the bill to be true as they are therein set forth, insists that they are insufficient for plaintiff to oblige defendant to answer. Hopkins v. Wainwright's Ex'r (S. C.) 1 Desaus. 302; Parish v. Sloan, 38 N. C. 607, 609.

A demurrer is an allegation that, admitting the facts of the preceding pleading to be true as stated by the party making it, he has yet shown no cause why the party demurring should be compelled by the court to proceed further; and the import of the demurrer is that the objecting party will not proceed, but will wait the judgment of the court whether he is bound so to do. Reid v. Field, 1 S. E. 395, 397, 83 Va. 26.

A demurrer in law is the tender of an issue in law on the facts which have been established by the pleadings. Hall v. Browder's Adm'rs, 5 Miss. (4 How.) 224, 228; Goodman v. Ford, 23 Miss. (1 Cushm.) 592, 595.

A demurrer raises a question of law, and is directed to the sufficiency of the complaint. Hostetter Co. v. E. G. Lyons Co. (U. S.) 99 Fed. 734, 735.

A demurrer is in effect a declaration that the party demurring will go no further because the other has shown nothing against him. Webb v. Vanderbilt, 39 N. Y. Super. Ct. (7 Jones & S.) 4, 10.

A demurrer to an answer searches the record, and requires the court to examine into the sufficiency of the facts stated in the petition to constitute a legal cause of action against the answering defendant. Boggs v. Wann (U. S.) 58 Fed. 681, 683.

A demurrer in equity is similar to one in law, and is an appeal to the court whether defendants should be compelled to answer the bill, where the demurrer is for cause apparent on the face of the bill. Martin v. McBryde, 38 N. C. 531, 533.

A demurrer is a demand of the judgment of the court whether the defendant is bound to set forth any defense. McMasters v. West Chester Normal School, 13 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 481, 487.

The office of a demurrer is to sweep away a defective pleading. Morrell v. Ball, 45 App. Div. 584, 585, 61 N. Y. Supp. 405, 406 (citing Standard Fashion Co. v. Siegel-Cooper Co., 157 N. Y. 60, 68, 51 N. E. 408, 410, 43 L. R. A. 854, 68 Am. St. Rep. 749).

A demurrer addresses itself to a pleading which, however defective or insufficient it may be, is properly in court. Goodrich v. Alfred, 43 Atl. 1041, 1042, 72 Conn. 257.

A demurrer is not a pruning hook, and cannot be used to trim out immaterial and irrelevant matter. This must be done by motion. In re McMurry's Estate, 78 N. W. 691, 107 Iowa, 648.

Chitty, in his treatise on Pleading, says (volume 1, p. 705): "A 'demurrer' has been defined to be a declaration that the party demurring will go no further because the other has not shown sufficient matter against him, and in point of form no precise words are necessary in a demurrer;" and "a plea, which is in substance a demurrer, though very informal, will be considered as such, and it is a general rule that there cannot be a demurrer to a demurrer." Davies v. Gibson, 2 Ark. (2 Pike) 115, 117.

As an admission.

A "demurrer" admits the facts stated in a pleading to which it applies, but insists that in law it does not call for the relief which that pleading seeks. It thus raises an issue, not of fact, but of law. The word comes from a Latin word "demorari"—to abide; and "he that demurreth in law is said to abide in law." Pickens' Ex'rs v. Knisley, 15 S. E. 997, 36 W. Va. 794 (quoting Coke).

Demurrer is the formal mode of disputing the sufficiency in law of the pleading of the other side. In effect, it is an allegation that even if the facts as stated in the pleading to which objection is taken be true, yet their legal consequences are not such as to put the demurring party to the necessity of answering them or proceeding further with the cause. A demurrer to a pleading admits all the material facts stated therein, but alleges that those facts in law do not constitute a cause of action, and submits that question, and that question alone, to the judgment of the court. A demurrer admits all the allegations, but it admits nothing but what is material and well pleaded. Moreover, a demurrer is only a technical admission, and does not involve any confession. Conclusions of law are never admitted by a demurrer. Groesbeeck v. Dunscomb (N. Y.) 41 How. Prac. 302, 321.

A demurrer admits all such facts as are sufficiently pleaded, but is no admission of such as are not sufficiently pleaded. Coxe v. Gulick, 10 N. J. Law (5 Halst.) 328, 329.

A demurrer, for the purposes thereof, admits the truth of all the material allegations in the pleading. Tecumseh State Bank v. Maddox, 46 Pac. 563, 565, 4 Okl. 583.

A demurrer is said to admit all the allegations of the bill, but that is not for the purpose of a trial upon the merits. It is only for the determination of the sufficiency of the paper demurred to. Belden v. Blackman, 83 N. W. 616, 617, 124 Mich. 667.

A demurrer admits the facts set forth, and challenges their sufficiency in law upon which to maintain the action. First Nat. Bank v. Kingsley, 84 Me. 111, 113, 24 Atl. 794, 795.

A demurrer is an admission of the fact, submitting the law arising on that fact to the court. Ex parte Vermilyea (N. Y.) 6 Cow. 555, 559.

A demurrer admits all facts which are well pleaded. O'Driscol v. McBurney (S. C.) 2 Brev. 451, 452.

A demurrer neither asserts nor denies any matter of fact. It merely, in effect, advances a legal proposition, namely, that the pleading demurred to is insufficient in law to maintain the case of the adverse party; and, under our practice, all demurrers must distinctly specify the reasons why the pleading demurred to is insufficient. Miller v. Cross, 48 Atl. 213, 214, 73 Conn. 538.

A demurrer to the declaration is not to be classed among pleas to the action, not only because it may be taken as well to any part of the pleadings as to the declaration, but also because it neither affirms nor denies any matter of fact, and is not, therefore, regarded as strictly a plea of any class, but rather an excuse for not pleading. To demur is to rest or pause. A demurrer merely advances a legal proposition. It forms an issue of law, admitting the facts, so far as well pleaded, for the purpose of taking the opinion of the court preliminarily. Its language is: "That allowing all that is alleged to be true, there is not anything that calls for an answer, plea, or defense." In Pease v. Phelps, 10 Conn. 62, the court said: "A demurrer presents only an issue in law to the court for consideration. The jury have no concern with it; and although it is a rule of pleading that a demurrer admits facts well pleaded for the purpose of determining their legal sufficiency, yet as a rule of evidence it was never supposed that a demurrer admitted anything. A demurrer, then, is not an absolute admission. Its only office is to raise issues of law upon facts stated in the pleadings demurred to; so that a demurrer cannot perform the office of an answer in admitting the facts alleged." Rice v. Rice, 10 Pac. 495, 496, 13 Or. 337.

A demurrer only admits facts that are well pleaded. Mere averments or legal conclusions are not admitted by a demurrer until the facts and circumstances set forth are sufficient to sustain the allegation. Horsford v. Gudger (U. S.) 35 Fed. 388.

A demurrer admits matters of fact well pleaded and all reasonable inferences to be drawn therefrom, but not mere arguments or conclusions of law as made or drawn by the pleader. Dennison Mfg. Co. v. Thomas Mfg. Co. (U. S.) 94 Fed. 651, 654 (citing United States v. Des Moines Nav. & R. Co., 142 U. S. 510, 544, 12 Sup. Ct. 308, 35 L. Ed. 1099; Chicot County v. Sherwood, 13 Sup. Ct. 695, 698, 148 U. S. 529, 37 L. Ed. 546).

"Demurred," as used in a court record reciting that the defendant had demurred, construed to comprehend "as much as would be comprehended by the language used in defining the term 'demurrer,' and must be regarded as equivalent to the declaration of a defendant, made in open court and placed upon the record of the court, that he will stay, or go no further in the court, because his adversary has not shown sufficient matter against him." Davies v. Gibson, 2 Ark. (2 Pike) 115, 118.

A demurrer denies the right to recovery or relief in whole or in part, admitting a properly pleaded allegation in the petition to be true, and is founded either upon the want of jurisdiction of the court or of the right of the petitioner, or upon the non-joinder or misjoinder of the parties or causes of action, or the absence of liability by defendant to the petitioner. Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 5048.

As a pleading.

A demurrer is a pleading. Rosenbach v. Dreyfuss (U. S.) 1 Fed. 391, 393.

The term "to plead," when used in a limited and appropriate sense, excludes the idea of a demurrer. Welsh v. Blackwell, 14 N. J. Law (2 J. S. Green) 344, 346.

No common-law writer or lawmaker ever confounded a plea or pleading with a demurrer, which implies simply a refusal to plead. State ex rel. Alexander v. Ryan, 2 Mo. App. 303, 309.

A demurrer to a declaration is not classed among pleas, not only because it may be taken as well to any other part of the pleadings as to the declaration, but also because it neither affirms nor denies any matter of fact, and is not, therefore, regarded as strictly a plea of any class, but rather as an excuse for not pleading. A demurrer merely advances a legal proposition—it forms an issue in law; admitting the facts, so far as well pleaded, for the purpose of taking the opinion of the court primarily. Its language is: "Allowing all that is alleged to be true, there is not anything that calls for an answer, plea, or defense." Havens v. Hartford & N. H. R. Co., 28 Conn. 69, 89 (citing Gould, Pl.).

A demurrer is a legal exception to the sufficiency of the opposing pleading to which it refers, and raises an issue of law, and is a pleading, within the meaning both of the statute and common law; and hence, on a rule to plead, defendants were authorized to file a demurrer. Mulvey v. Staab, 12 Pac. 699, 701, 4 N. M. (Johns.) 50.

Though Rev. St. 1894, § 340, denominates a demurrer as a pleading, yet, strictly speaking, a demurrer is not a pleading. In the common-law practice a plea is the defendant's answer to the merits of the declaration as opposed to a demurrer, and to plead is to make allegations of fact which follow and oppose the allegations in the declaration. Hence Rev. St. 1894, § 379, providing for liberality in the construction of pleadings, does not apply to a demurrer. Merrill v. Pepperdine, 36 N. E. 921, 922, 9 Ind. App. 416.

Exception synonymous.

The word "exception," as used in Pen. Code, § 2036, providing for exceptions to challenges to the jury, is equivalent to a demurrer, for the denial of the sufficiency admits the allegations to be true in point of fact. It is immaterial whether the denial of sufficiency be expressed by the use of the word "exception" or the word "demurrer"; each performs the same office. State v. Tighe, 71 Pac. 3, 5, 27 Mont. 327.

Motion to strike distinguished.

While it is true that a motion to strike out a pleading is not the equivalent of a demurrer thereto, yet, where the motion has been sustained, it must be held that it, like a demurrer, admits the truth of all the facts well pleaded for the purposes of the motion. Faylor v. Brice, 7 Ind. App. 551, 555, 34 N. E. 833.

DEMURRER TO EVIDENCE.

A demurrer to evidence arises on an issue in law on the facts established by the evidence, and by necessity involves the admission of the truth of the facts intended to be proved by it. Goodman v. Ford, 23 Miss. (1 Cushm.) 592, 595; Hall v. Browder's Adm'rs, 5 Miss. (4 How.) 224, 228.

A demurrer to evidence is a pleading admitting the truth of the evidence demurred to, and alleging that the same does not constitute in law a cause of action, or does not sustain the burden of proof placed on the plaintiff. It admits the truth of the facts proved, together with the conclusion fairly inferable therefrom, and asks the judgment of the court as to their legal effect. Pharr v. Bachelor, 3 Ala. 237, 242.

A demurrer to evidence is a proceeding by which the court is called on to declare what the law is on the facts shown in evidence. It withdraws from the jury the application of the law to the facts, the truth of which it, of course, admits. Patteson v. Ford (Va.) 2 Grat. 18, 28.

A demurrer to evidence is a proceeding by which the court in which the action is pending is called on to decide what the law is on the facts shown in evidence, and it is regarded, in general, as analogous to a demurrer on the facts alleged in the pleading. When a party wishes to withdraw from the jury the application of the law to the facts, he may, by consent of the court, demur in law upon the evidence, the effect of which is to take from the jury and refer to the court the application of the law to the facts; and thus the evidence is made a part of the record, and is considered by the court, as in the case of a special verdict. Suydam v. Williamson, 61 U. S. (20 How.) 427, 436, 15 L. Ed. 978; Van Stone v. Stillwell & Bierce Mfg. Co., 12 Sup. Ct. 181, 183, 142 U. S. 128, 35 L. Ed. 961. "In the case of Nelson v. Whitfield, 82 N. C. 46, 54, the court held that a demurrer to the evidence withdraws a case from the jury; and it is laid down in Tidd, Prac. 865, that, when the evidence is in writing, the adverse party will be required to join in the demurrer, but, when the parol evidence is loose and indeterminate or circumstantial, he will not be required to do so, unless the party demurring will admit upon the record every fact and every conclusion which the evidence offered conduces to prove. The demurrer to the evidence is still preserved in seventeen of the states. The practice has not been repudiated in the other states, as obnoxious to their constitutions, but it has been superseded by a less cumbersome and more radical procedure, to wit, ordering a nonsuit and directing a verdict." Hopkins v. Nashville, C. & St. L. R. R. (Tenn.) 34 S. W. 1029, 1033, 32 L. R. A. 354. The demurrer not only admits the truth of all the evidence adduced by the party against whose evidence it is directed, but admits all the inferences which may be reasonably drawn therefrom. Summers v. Louisville & N. R. R., 96 Tenn. (12 Pickle) 459, 463, 35 S. W. 210 (citing Hinote v. Simpson, 17 Fla. 444; Sawyer v. Fitts [Ala.] 2 Port. 9); Edmisson v. Drumm-Flato Commission Co., 73 Pac. 958, 960, 13 Okl. 440; Harwood v. Blythe, 32 Tex. 800, 804; Bradbury v. Reed, 23 Tex. 285; Pitt v. Texas Storage Co. (Tex.) 18 S. W. 465, 466, 4 Willson, Civ. Cas. Ct. App. § 295. It admits not only those facts which are directly sworn to and stated on the record, but also all conclusions of fact to which the evidence is admissible, and to which it is properly relevant and applicable. Duerhagen v. United States Ins. Co. (Pa.) 2 Serg. & R. 309, 315. Consequently, all the court can decide on a demurrer to the evidence is whether any competent evidence was given or not. Harwood v. Blythe, 32 Tex. 800, 803.

A demurrer to the evidence is only a pleading bringing before the court the admitted evidence. Heald v. Wallace, 71 S. W. 80, 82, 109 Tenn. 346.

A demurrer to evidence is a proceeding by which the judges, whose province it is to determine questions of law, are called on to declare what the law is on the facts in evidence; and it is analogous to a demurrer on the facts alleged in the pleading. Mobile & O. R. Co. v. McArthur, 43 Miss. 180, 185 (citing 1 Phil. Ev. 313).

A demurrer to evidence is analogous to a demurrer in pleading; the party from whom it comes declaring that he will not proceed because the evidence offered on the other side is not sufficient to maintain the issue. A demurrer to the evidence leaves open no question whatever in the law of evidence—that is to say, of the admissibility of evidence—but only, like other demurrers, questions of substantive law. A demurrer to the evidence waives objections interposed to the admissibility and competency of evidence by the party who filed the demurrer. Southern Ry. Co. v. Leinart, 64 S. W. 899, 900, 107 Tenn. 635. It also, if not precisely similar, bears a close analogy to a motion for a nonsuit, and the action of a court in granting a nonsuit on the ground that plaintiff has failed to prove a sufficient case for a jury is as much a decision upon a matter of law as its action in sustaining a demurrer to a pleading. Kleinschmidt v. McAndrews, 5 Pac. 281, 286, 4 Mont. 8.

Early in its history this court adopted the term "nonsuit" as the appropriate name for that proceeding known to the common-law practice as a "demurrer to the evidence." By a demurrer to the evidence the party demurring declares that he will not proceed because the evidence offered on the other side is not sufficient to maintain the issue. That the nonsuit of our practice is the same as the demurrer to the evidence of the common law is clearly pointed out by Mr. Justice Bleckley in Anderson v. Pollard, 62 Ga. 46, 50, where he says: "The want of necessary averments in the declaration is not cause for a nonsuit, for a nonsuit, under our practice, takes place on failure to support the declaration by evidence. We demur to the evidence as insufficient, and move to nonsuit the plaintiff. A motion of nonsuit is aimed at the evidence as compared with what the declaration is, not at the declaration as compared with what it ought to be." Kelly v. Strouse & Bros., 43 S. E. 280, 284, 116 Ga. 872 (citing Reeves v. Jackson, 113 Ga. 182, 38 S. E. 314; Bray v. Chattanooga, R. & S. Ry. Co., 113 Ga. 308, 38 S. E. 849; Barge v. Robinson, 115 Ga. 41, 42, 41 S. E. 258).

Motion to instruct verdict distinguished.

"The difference between the demurrer to the evidence and the motion to instruct a verdict for the defendant is technical, but it is still a practical difference, in this: that the defendant does not choose to withdraw his case from the jury, and rely upon the testimony already introduced, but exercises his option of calling for the judgment of the court upon the strength of the plaintiff's case, with the privilege, in case the decision is against him, of proceeding to develop his defense to the plaintiff's action." Eberstadt v. State, 45 S. W. 1007, 1008, 92 Tex. 94.

DEMURRER ORE TENUS.

A ruling on an objection to evidence, although for convenience it is called a "demurrer ore tenus," is not a demurrer, within the meaning of the statute which authorizes an appeal from an order which sustains or overrules a demurrer. Mandelert v. Superior Consol. Land Co., 80 N. W. 726, 104 Wis. 423.

DENIAL.

See "Conjunctive Denials"; "General Denial"; "Specific Denial."

A denial is not a defense at all, and may not be so designated, since a denial raises an issue, but a defense consists of new matter affirmatively stated. Flack v. O'Brien, 43 N. Y. Supp. 854, 855, 19 Misc. Rep. 399;

Green v. Brown, 49 N. Y. Supp. 163, 164, 22 Misc. Rep. 279.

A mere negation of an allegation of value is not such a denial as the rules of pleading require. Dean v. Leonard, 9 Minn. 190, 198 (Gil. 176, 179).

A statement of facts by way of defense, which are merely inconsistent with those stated by the plaintiff, is in effect a denial, and not new matter. Mott v. Baxter, 68 Pac. 220, 221, 29 Colo. 418.

There is a "denial" of plaintiff's allegation in an action for divorce that he left the defendant because of certain acts committed by her, when the defendant alleges that the plaintiff left her without cause. A statement of facts by way of defense, which are merely inconsistent with those stated by the plaintiff, is in effect a denial. Sylvis v. Sylvis, 17 Pac. 912, 919, 11 Colo. 319 (citing Bliss, Code Pl. § 333).

A "denial," with regard to freehold rent, sufficient to work a disseisin, is when the rent, being lawfully demanded, is not paid; for denial is a disseisin of a rent charge. Farley v. Craig, 11 N. J. Law (6 Halst.) 262, 272.

DENIZEN.

A "denizen" is in a middle state between an alien and a natural-born citizen, and although subject to some of the disabilities of the former, is entitled to many of the privileges of the latter. He may take lands by purchase or devise, which an alien may not, but cannot take by inheritance; for his parent, through whom he must claim, being an alien, has no inheritable blood, and therefore could convey none to the child. From a like defect of hereditary blood the issue of a denizen born before denization cannot inherit from him, but his issue born after may. McClenaghan v. McClenaghan (S. C.) 1 Strob. Eq. 295, 319, 47 Am. Dec. 532.

DENOMINATION.

In an indictment charging the larceny of national bank bills, the number and denomination of which are to the grand jury unknown, "denomination" refers to the value or number of dollars the several bills represented, as the denomination of $500, etc. Duvall v. State, 63 Ala. 12, 17.

As a religious sect.

Religious denomination, see "Religious Sect."

A "denomination" is a religious sect having a particular name. Hale v. Everett, 53 N. H. 9, 92, 16 Am. Rep. 82.

A "denomination" is defined by Webster as "A class or collection of individuals called by the same name; a sect." Wilson v. Perry, 1 S. E. 302, 304, 314, 29 W. Va. 169.

A "sect or denomination of Christians" should be construed to include a company of persons denominated Shakers, who have formed themselves into a community as a religious society, and entered into covenant relations with each other as a church, according to their faith and tenets, and have chosen deacons and a clerk, appointed their deacons, and their successors in office, to hold the church property and have the management of its temporal concerns. Lawrence v. Fletcher, 49 Mass. (8 Metc.) 153, 162.

A "denomination of religious persons," as used in a statute which appropriated a certain fund held in trust for the purposes of religion, meant a sect or denomination of religious persons having a common system of faith, written or traditional. State v. Trustees of Township 9, Range 15, Ohio Co.'s Purchase, 7 Ohio St. 58, 64.

DENOUNCED.

An act or thing is "denounced" when the law declares it a crime and provides a punishment for it. State v. De Hart, 83 South. 605, 606, 109 La. 570.

DENOUNCEMENT.

"Denouncement" was a term used in Mexican law to denote a judicial proceeding by which an alien who acquired property in fraud of the law—that is, without observing its requirements—might be deprived of it by such proceeding, which, in its substantive characteristics, was equivalent to "inquest of office found" at common law. Williams v. Bennett, 20 S. W. 856, 859, 1 Tex. Civ. App. 498; De Merle v. Mathews, 26 Cal. 455, 477.

A "denouncement," in Mexican mining law, is the delation or accusation which one who desires to rehabilitate an old mine makes of the default which the former owner has committed, and by which the previous title has been lost. It has no application to anything connected with the title of a new mine. Castillero v. United States, 67 U. S. (2 Black) 17, 109, 17 L. Ed. 360.

The "denouncement" of a new work being a proceeding to restrain the erection of some new work, as, for instance, a building which may, if completed, injuriously affect the property of the complainant, is of a character similar to the interdict of possession. Von Schmidt v. Huntington, 1 Cal. 55, 63 (citing Escrache, Dict.).

DENTIST.

A "dentist" is a dental surgeon. He performs surgical operations upon the teeth and jaw, and, as incidental thereto, upon the flesh connected therewith. His sphere of operations is included in the larger one of the physician and surgeon. State v. Beck, 43 Atl. 366, 367, 21 R. I. 288, 45 L. R. A. 269.

As a mechanic.

A dentist, in one sense, is a professional man, but in another sense his calling is mainly mechanical, and the tools which he employs are used in mechanical operations. Dentistry was formerly purely mechanical, and instruction in it scarcely went beyond manual dexterity in the use of tools, and the knowledge of the human system generally, and of the diseases which might affect the teeth and render an operation important, was by no means considered necessary. Of late, however, as the physiology of the human system has become better understood, and the relation of its various parts and their mutual dependence are more clearly recognized, dentistry has made great progress as a science, and its practitioners claim with much justice to be classed among the learned professions. It is nevertheless true that the operations of the dentist are still for the most part mechanical, and, so far as tools are employed, they are purely so. The ordinary meaning of "mechanical tools" will include the instruments of a dentist, and such instruments would be exempt as "mechanics' tools." Maxon v. Perrott, 17 Mich. 332, 337, 97 Am. Dec. 191.

A dentist cannot be properly denominated a "mechanic," so as to be within the provisions of a statute exempting from execution the tools of a mechanic necessary for carrying on his trade. It is true that the practice of the dentist's art requires the use of instruments for manual operation, and that much of it consists in manual operation; but it also involves a knowledge of the physiology of the teeth, which cannot be acquired but by a proper course of study, and this is taught by learned treatises on the subject, and has a distinct, though limited, department of the medical art, in institutions established for the purpose. It requires both science and skill, and dentists cannot be included in the denomination of "mechanics." Whitcomb v. Reid, 31 Miss. 567, 568, 66 Am. Dec. 579.

As a physician or surgeon.

A dentist is one who performs manual or mechanical operations to preserve teeth, to cleanse, extract, insert, or repair them; and a dentist is not a physician within Code, § 1117, prohibiting the sale of liquor on Sunday except on "a prescription from a physician." State v. McMinn, 24 S. E. 523, 524, 118 N. C. 1259.

A dentist is one whose profession is to clean and extract teeth, repair them when diseased, and replace them, when necessary, by artificial ones, and a dentist will not be held to be a surgeon or physician, within the statutes relating to privileged communications. People v. De France, 62 N. W. 709, 712, 104 Mich. 563, 28 L. R. A. 139 (citing State v. Fisher, 24 S. W. 167, 119 Mo. 344, 22 L. R. A. 799); City of Cherokee v. Perkins, 92 N. W. 68, 69, 118 Iowa, 405.

DENTISTRY.

See "Practicing Dentistry."

Dental surgery, as medicine, see "Medicine."

Dentistry is not a "trade" within the meaning of the statute exempting from execution the tools of a mechanic necessary for carrying on his trade, for it is a pursuit requiring a correct knowledge of the anatomy and physiology of a part of the human body, as well as mechanical skill in the use of the necessary instruments; while Webster defines a "trade" to be the business or occupation which a person has learned, and which he carries on for procuring subsistence or for profit, particularly a mechanical employment, distinguished from the liberal arts and learned professions and from agriculture. Whitcomb v. Reid, 31 Miss. 567, 569, 68 Am. Dec. 579.

DENY.

Wag. St. p. 1017, § 15, requiring plaintiff in his reply to "deny" specifically each allegation controverted by him, is not satisfied by plaintiff's statement in his reply that he does not know whether a certain state of facts exists or not. Watson v. Hawkins, 60 Mo. 550, 553.

DEPART.

The word "depart," in the statute of limitations, being used in connection with the word "return," comprehends all persons who are without the territory, and is not limited to the inhabitants of the territory, and applies as well to persons coming from abroad as to citizens of the country going abroad for a temporary purpose and then returning. Burnes v. Crane, 1 Utah, 179, 182.

Code Civ. Proc. § 20, providing that if, after a cause of action accrues against any person, he shall "depart from the state," the time of his absence shall not be computed as any part of the period within which the action must be brought, means such an absence from the state as entirely suspends the power of the plaintiff to commence his action, and not a mere temporary absence from the state while the debtor's usual place of residence was within the state. Blodgett v. Utley, 4 Neb. 25, 28.

Under a statute suspending the running of the statute of limitations when a party against whom a cause of action has accrued departs from the state, it is held that a resident of the state who removes his residence to another state, but continues business in the state from which he removed, coming into that state openly, notoriously, and regularly each business day, and remaining there during working hours, has not "departed" from the state within the meaning of the statute. Webster v. Citizens' Bank (Neb.) 96 N. W. 118, 119.

Gen. St. 1865, p. 747, § 16, relative to limitations of actions, declaring that, if a debtor "depart" from the state after a cause of action shall have arisen against him, the time of his absence shall not be deemed or taken as any part of the time limited, does not necessarily mean a departure with intent to permanently change the residence of the party. Johnson v. Smith, 43 Mo. 499, 501.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 162, providing that if a cause of action accrues against any one, and he shall "depart from and reside out of the state," limitation shall be suspended during his absence, the statute is not put in motion by a casual visit to the state, but only by a return with a view to residence. Lee v. McKoy, 24 S. E. 210, 118 N. C. 518.

A Chinese subject, purchasing a through ticket, and embarking in an American vessel from one American port to another, and who does not leave the vessel when she, having leave to do so, touches at a foreign port, has not "departed" from the United States, within the meaning of the Chinese exclusion act of Congress of October 1, 1888, c. 1064, 25 Stat. 504 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1318]. In re Jack Sen (U. S.) 36 Fed. 441, 442.

DEPART FROM PORT.

"Departs from the port," within the meaning of Mechanic's Lien Law, Pub. St. Mass. c. 192, § 4, which provides that such lien shall be dissolved unless the person claiming the same files his claim within four days from the time when the vessel departs from the port at which she was when the debt was contracted, in the office of the clerk of the city or town within which the vessel was at such time, means to go to sea, to leave the harbor and enter on the high seas, whether upon a voyage to another port or in the prosecution of some business on the ocean, such as towing, fishing, rendering assistance, and the like. It is synonymous with "leave port," "go to sea," etc. The Helen Brown (U. S.) 28 Fed. 111, 112.

"Depart," as contained in insurance policies upon vessels requiring them to depart before a certain date, means to fairly set forward upon the voyage, and not merely to break ground. Moir v. Royal Exch. Assur. Co., 6 Taunt. 241.

Where a vessel leaves a port, at which a debt has been contracted on her account for repairs, in pursuit of some business, she "departs from port" within the meaning of the statute relative to proceedings for the collection of demands against ships or vessels. Rockefeller v. Thompson, 4 N. Y. Super. Ct. (2 Sandf.) 395.

A vessel does not "depart from port," within the lien laws, by merely moving from one portion of the port to the other, though the place to which the vessel moves is not within the municipal limits of the city at which the port is located. Young v. The Orpheus, 119 Mass. 179, 185.

DEPARTING THE REALM.

It is a "departing the realm" and an act of bankruptcy within St. 13 Eliz. c. 7, § 1, if a natural-born subject of England, domiciled abroad, comes to England for a temporary purpose, and leaves it sooner than he intended, to avoid an arrest. Williams v. Nunn, 1 Camp. 152, 155.

DEPARTING THIS LIFE WITHOUT ISSUE.

"Departing this life without issue," as used in a will by which testator provided that his real estate should be held sacred for the support of those to whom it was given during their natural lives, and that the same should descend to their children at their death, but, in the event of any of such children departing this life without issue, that the property so willed should descend to the brothers and sisters who may survive, should be construed as importing a failure of issue at the time of the death of the first devisee, and not an indefinite failure. Armstrong v. Armstrong, 53 Ky. (14 B. Mon.) 333, 340.

DEPARTMENT.

See "Appropriate Department"; "Executive Department"; "Fire Department"; "Head of Department"; "Land Department"; "Legislative Department"; "Military Departments"; "Principal Department"; "Public Department."

One of the significations of "department" is a province or business assigned to a particular person. The business assigned to a particular person is, according to this definition, in his "department." The business belonging to the post office is in a "department" of the post office, and a person employed in that business is a person employed in a "department" of the post office. If, then, the carrying of the mail be a part of the business of a post office, it would seem that the person who carries it is a person employed in a "department" of the general post office, within Act April 30, 1810, regulating the post office establishment. United States v. Belew (U. S.) 24 Fed. Cas. 1079, 1080.

It has sometimes been found difficult, if not impossible, to describe a "department" of a person's business in language which will fit all cases, and furnish a sure test by which to determine in every instance if a person in charge of what is claimed to be a department is so in fact, and for that reason is a vice principal, or is merely a fellow servant. Much depends on the magnitude and character of the work that is done in that subdivision of the business which one has been appointed to superintend, and upon the further question whether the work is of such a nature as requires intelligent and careful supervision on the part of the master. In Central R. Co. v. Keegan, 160 U. S. 259, 264, 16 Sup. Ct. 269, 40 L. Ed. 418, the remark made concerning the doctrine of departmental control was, in substance, that while the court recognized that the head of a department might, in a proper case, be regarded as a vice principal, yet this must not be understood to mean that every separate piece of work was a separate "department"; and where a wrecking company had purchased buildings used for an exposition, and placed the general superintendent in charge of the work of tearing down the buildings, the tearing down being separate from the selling of the materials, which was in charge of different men, such tearing down was a separate "department," and the superintendent thereof was, as to the men employed, not a fellow servant, but a vice principal. Chicago House Wrecking Co. v. Birney, 117 Fed. 72, 77, 54 C. C. A. 458.

"Departments," as used in the charter of Denver, art. 2, § 23, conferring on the city council the power to provide for the employment of clerks in any of the departments in the city government, is not used in a technical sense; so that wherever, in any branch or portion of the city government, services are necessary for which provision has not been made, the want may be supplied by the authority of that section. Morgan v. City of Denver, 59 Pac. 619, 622, 14 Colo. App. 147.

"Department," as used in a proviso to Laws 1893, p. 120, § 2, reciting that nothing therein contained should be so construed as to make employes fellow servants with other employes engaged in any other department or service, mean a subdivision of business, as running a train, clearing away a wreck, repairing a track, etc. Gulf, C. & S.

F. Ry. Co. v. Warner, 35 S. W. 364, 366, 89 Tex. 475.

DEPARTURE.

In pleading.

A "departure," in pleading, is defined to be when a party quits or departs from the case or defense which he has first made, and has recourse to another. White v. Joy, 13 N. Y. (3 Kern.) 83, 89; Allen v. Watson (N. Y.) 16 Johns. 205, 206; Burr v. Baldwin (N. Y.) 2 Wend. 580, 581; Kimberlin v. Carter, 49 Ind. 111, 112; Schneider v. Oregon Pac. Ry. Co., 25 Pac. 391, 392, 20 Or. 172; Tappan v. Harwood (S. C.) 2 Speers, 536, 547; Neve v. Allen, 41 Pac. 966, 968, 55 Kan. 638; Rosby v. St. Paul, M. & M. Ry. Co., 33 N. W. 698, 699, 37 Minn. 171; Bishop v. Travis, 53 N. W. 461, 51 Minn. 183; Logdice v. Gannon, 21 Atl. 100, 101, 60 Conn. 81; United States v. Morris (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 1836, 1847.

A departure in pleading is not allowed because the record would by such means be spun into prolixity. Where defendant, in an action on the penal part of the bond, pleaded performance, he could not, in reply to plaintiff's replication, attempt to show a justification of the failure to perform, this being a departure from the plea. Warren v. Powers, 5 Conn. 373, 379.

It is not a "departure" to set up new matter by way of replication, or additional facts not inconsistent with those averred in the complaint. Sweetser v. Odd Fellows' Mut. Aid Ass'n, 117 Ind. 97, 99, 19 N. E. 722, 723 (citing Fanning v. Hibernia Ins. Co., 37 Ohio St. 344). Where the reply, in a quo warranto proceeding, sets up the particular facts which it is claimed show that defendant company is now exercising franchises and privileges which it may once have had, and which it does not now possess, such reply does not constitute a "departure" from the petition, but supports and fortifies it. State v. Walnut Hills, M. & P. Road Co. (Ohio) 7 O. C. D. 453, 455.

A departure, under the Code, admits the groundlessness of the complaint, abandons the case made by it, and makes a new one. Louisville, N. A. & C. Ry. Co. v. Herr, 35 N. E. 556, 557, 135 Ind. 591. This does not in any sense avoid the answer, but confesses it without avoiding it; otherwise it would not be a departure at all. McAroy v. Wright, 25 Ind. 22, 29.

The term "departure," as used in the law of pleading, is used to designate a pleading, filed by the plaintiff after the declaration, which does not support the declaration. The term is applicable to a replication of set-off to a plea of set-off, as the set-off so pleaded in the replication should have been pleaded in the declaration. Heath v. Doyle, 27 Atl. 333, 335, 18 R. I. 252.

The term "departure," in pleading, supposes a good complaint, and a departure is an abandonment of the cause of action as stated in some essential particular, and the substitution of something materially different. Where a complaint does not state a cause of action, the replication cannot be a departure. Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Cahill, 45 Pac. 285, 287, 8 Colo. App. 158.

Where the pleader deserts in his replication the ground in point of law upon which the account rested the cause, there is as much a departure as if he had changed his ground in point of fact. Thus, where a plaintiff in bringing his action relied on the statute of one state, but in his replication changes his ground and relies on the statute of another state, there is a departure. Midland Steel Co. v. Citizens' Nat. Bank, 59 N. E. 211, 214, 26 Ind. App. 71.

"When a man in his former plea pleadeth an estate made by the common law, in the second plea regularly he shall not make it good by an act of Parliament. So when, in his former plea, he intituleth himselfe generally by the common law, in a second plea he shall not enable himselfe by a custome, but should have pleaded it first." Co. Litt. 304a. A "departure" may be either in the substance of the action or defense, or the law on which it is founded, as, if a declaration be founded on a common law, and the replication attempt to maintain it by a special custom or act of Parliament. Steph. Pl. pp. 412-414, thus discusses "departure": "These, it will be observed, are cases in which the party deserts the ground in point of fact that he had first taken; but it is also a departure if he puts the same facts on a new ground in point of law." In Saund. Pl. & Ev. pp. 806, 807, it is said a departure in pleading is said to be when a party quits or departs from the case or defense which he first made, and has recourse to another. It is when his replication or rejoinder contains matter not pursuant to the declaration or plea, and which does not support and fortify it. A departure may be either in the substance of the action or defense, or the law on which it is founded. Union Pac. Ry. Co. v. Wyler, 15 Sup. Ct. 877, 880, 158 U. S. 285, 39 L. Ed. 983.

Matter which merely explains or fortifies the previous pleading is not a departure. Moreover, a variation in immaterial matter is not a departure. Thus, in an action against the maker of a note, the complaint in which alleged the execution of a promissory note to the payee and the indorsement and transfer of it by the payee to the plaintiff, and the answer alleged payment of the note to the payee and a redelivery of it by him to the maker, but the reply admitted the fact of the redelivery of the note, and alleged that the maker had subsequently for value transferred it to one C., who in turn transferred it to the plaintiff, it was held that the reply was not a departure from the complaint. Bishop v. Travis, 53 N. W. 461, 51 Minn. 183.

A reply which alleges that the contract was just as alleged in the complaint, that the writing set up in the answer is not the contract in fact made, and that the plaintiff was induced to sign it by the false and fraudulent representations of defendant as to its contents, is not a departure. On the contrary, it fortifies and supports the allegation of the complaint by avoiding the new matter set up in the answer. Rosby v. St. Paul, M. & M. Ry. Co., 33 N. W. 698, 699, 37 Minn. 171.

Where a complaint in ejectment demands possession of the whole of the premises, and the plaintiff in the replication, to avoid a plea of jurisdiction, prays only a part of the premises and nominal damages, such replication constitutes a departure. Logiodice v. Gannon, 21 Atl. 100, 101, 60 Conn. 81.

Where, in an action on account for merchandise sold, the answer sets up as a defense that defendant conveyed an interest in a mining claim to plaintiff in full satisfaction of his debt, a replication alleging that plaintiff was induced through false and fraudulent representations to accept the conveyance, such representation is not a departure. Jamieson House Furnishing Co. v. Brainerd (Colo.) 66 Pac. 675, 676.

A test of departure in a reply is the question whether evidence of the facts alleged in it would be, if received, contradictory of the allegations of the petition. Thus, where the petition alleges ownership, positive and unqualified, in the plaintiff, and the reply admitted the ownership to be that of a mortgage, which is ownership qualified and special, there was a departure. Johnson v. State Bank, 52 Pac. 860, 861, 59 Kan. 250.

Of vessel.

"Departure," when applied to a vessel, is a word of different meaning than "sail." It imports an effectual leaving of the place behind. If the vessel be detained or driven back, though she may have sailed, there is no "departure." Union Ins. Co. v. Tysen (N. Y.) 3 Hill, 118, 126.

Under Pub. St. Mass. c. 192, § 15, requiring a claim to be filed within four days after "the departure" of a vessel from the port at which she was when the debt was contracted, a departure of the vessel from the port on a pleasure excursion is included. The Huron (U. S.) 29 Fed. 183, 184.

The taking of a vessel from the city of New York to the dock in New Jersey for a single day for the process of repairing her was not a "departure" within the meaning of the statute of New York giving a lien for debts contracted within such state. The John Farron (U. S.) 13 Fed. Cas. 670, 672.

DEPENDENCE.

The word "dependence," as used in connection with the liability to support a family, is not restricted to support and maintenance, food and clothing, but it is intended, where a claim to a homestead is made by an aunt because of the dependence of her nephews and nieces upon her, to include moral and mental training, and that care and nurture which would be prompted by the feelings of affection which existed between her and the children of her sister. American Nat. Bank v. Cruger, 71 S. W. 784, 789, 31 Tex. Civ. App. 17 (citing Barry v. Hale, 21 S. W. 783, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 668).

DEPENDENCY.

The word "dependency," as used in St. 1786, c. 68, regulating licensed houses, means some building detached from the house, and a part of the same property. Thus any building used for the common purpose of an inn, and situated within its curtilage is a "dependency" of such inn within the statute. Goff v. Fowler, 20 Mass. (3 Pick.) 300, 301; Commonwealth v. Estabrook, 27 Mass. (10 Pick.) 293, 294.

Of nation.

"Dependencies," as used in the nonimportation law of March 2, 1812 (2 Stat. 651), which revived the act of March, 1809, the provisions of which extended to the possessions as well as the colonies and dependencies of Great Britain, implied some civil and political relation borne by one country to another as its superior, different from that of a mere possession. United States v. The Nancy (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 69, 71.

DEPENDENT.

See "Wholly Dependent."

The phrase "person or family dependent on him," in the constitution of a life association providing that the benefits were to be paid on behalf of a member to such member or members of his family, or person or persons dependent on him, as he should direct and designate by name, was construed not to include any persons who were not actual relatives or standing in place of relatives in some permanent way, or in some actual dependence on the member. Supreme Lodge Knights of Honor v. Narin, 26 N. W. 826, 828, 60 Mich. 44.

Within the meaning of the constitution and by-laws of a mutual benefit association, which designates as a class who may receive the benefits of the society persons dependent on deceased members, means those sustained by or who rely for support on the aid of deceased members. Alexander v. Parker, 33 N. E. 183, 184, 144 Ill. 355, 19 L. R. A. 187; Nye v. Grand Lodge A. O. U. W., 36 N. E. 429, 436, 9 Ind. App. 131.

A law of a beneficial association required applicants to enter on their applications the name or names of the members of their family or those dependent on them to whom they desired the benefit paid. It also provided that members in good standing might surrender their certificates and have new ones issued payable to such beneficiary or beneficiaries dependent on them as they might direct. Held, that the word "dependent" as used in the second clause was employed to describe all who might be beneficiaries, and did not restrict the right of substitution to persons wholly dependent on the member for support. Marsh v. Supreme Council American Legion of Honor, 21 N. E. 1070, 1072, 149 Mass. 512, 4 L. R. A. 382.

"Dependent," as used in the constitution of the Ancient Order of United Workmen, section 5, which provides that each member shall designate the person or persons to whom the beneficiary fund due at his death shall be paid, who shall in every instance be one or more members of his family, some one related to him by blood, or who shall be dependent on him, means some person or persons dependent for support in some way upon the deceased. Citing Ballou v. Gile, 50 Wis. 614, 7 N. W. 561. It is not restricted to those whom the deceased may be legally or morally bound to support, but the term should be restricted to those whom it is lawful for him to support. Supreme Lodge A. O. U. W. v. Hutchinson, 33 N. E. 816, 819, 6 Ind. App. 399 (citing Keener v. Grand Lodge A. O. U. W., 38 Mo. App. 543).

"Dependence" is defined to be the state of deriving existence, support, or direction from another; the state of being subject to the power and operation of extraneous force; and such is its use in a statute giving a right of action for death in favor of those dependent on the deceased. It will include an aged mother, a minor sister, and a niece whom decedent had supported for some years. Duval v. Hunt, 15 South. 876, 888, 34 Fla. 85.

The term "person dependent on such injured person," in an act authorizing a recovery against a person unlawfully furnishing spirituous liquors for injuries resulting therefrom to any person who shall be in any manner dependent on such injured person, does not apply to one upon whom the injured person becomes dependent in consequence of intoxication produced by liquor unlawfully furnished, and who was not previously dependent upon such injured person. A municipal corporation is not a "person" within the meaning of the statute, though by reason of the illegal sale the person becomes a pauper and is supported by the municipality. Hollis v. Davis, 56 N. H. 74, 83.

Children who were provided a home with their mother, and supported during the life of the insured by the insured, were "dependents" of the father. Hanley v. Supreme Tent Knights of Maccabees, 77 N. Y. Supp. 246, 38 Misc. Rep. 161.

As any one not self-supporting.

A man whose earnings are sufficient to adequately support himself is not "dependent," though he may by law be chargeable with the maintenance of others, for the support of whom and himself such earnings are insufficient, within Code, § 2858, providing that a mother, or, if no mother, a father, may recover for the homicide of the child, minor or sui juris, upon whom she is dependent. Georgia R. & Banking Co. v. Spinks, 36 S. E. 855, 111 Ga. 571.

The word "dependent" usually has reference to the quality of being conditioned on something else, as the covenant of the purchaser of land to pay for it is usually so expressed in the contract of purchase as to be dependent on performance of the vendor's covenant to convey. As used in a statute giving a right of action for death caused by wrongful act to persons "dependent" on the deceased, the term means an incapacity on account of age, mental or physical infirmity or inability by reason of opportunity, to provide means for support, and whether or not one was dependent upon a person whose death has been wrongfully caused is a question to be determined by the facts and circumstances of each case. Duval v. Hunt, 15 South. 876, 888, 34 Fla. 85.

The term "dependent persons" includes minors who do not own property in their own right, although they have been earning their own living. Woods v. Perkins, 9 South. 48, 43 La. Ann. 347.

The provision of Rev. St. § 1631, for the homestead in favor of a debtor having family or mother or father, or persons "dependent on him for support," means persons dependent for actual and necessary support, and not persons able to earn a living. In this connection the court remarks that the law does not contemplate the case of a debtor who supports in idleness persons, even children, male or female, who are not minors, cripples, imbeciles, infirm of constitution or health, or otherwise disabled in making a living for themselves. It was consequently held that the dependency of healthy, robust, adult daughters was neither actual nor necessary, and that, as there was no reason why they should not support themselves, they could not be regarded as persons dependent for support. Decuir v. Benker, 33 La. Ann. 320, 321.

Affianced wife.

"Dependent," as used in a by-law of an insurance company requiring that the beneficiaries should be persons dependent on the member, means persons who rely on the member's ability for pecuniary aid, such as clothing, lodging, food, or education, and does not include the affianced wife of the insured who remains such until after the member's death, since the only obligation imposed by his engagement to marry was an obligation to carry out his contract. Their mutual promises to marry did not in any sense, by itself, make her dependent on him. Parke v. Welch, 33 Ill. App. 188. As used in Rev. St. 1877, c. 204, authorizing certain associations to provide in their by-laws for the payment by each member of a fixed sum to be payable at his death to his widow, orphans, or other dependents, it means some person or persons "dependent for support in some way on the deceased." It does not include a girl to whom he is engaged to be married. Supreme Council American Legion of Honor v. Perry, 5 N. E. 634, 636, 140 Mass. 580.

Creditor.

An association was organized under Pub. St. c. 115, authorizing the organization of insurance corporations for the purpose of assisting the widows, orphans, or other persons dependent on deceased members. Held, that the word "dependent" as there used meant a person relying on the insured for support and sustenance, and could not be construed to include a person whose only relation to the deceased member was that of creditor, and a benefit certificate in a company organized under such act, payable to the member's creditor, was void. Skillings v. Massachusetts Benefit Ass'n, 15 N. E. 566, 568, 146 Mass. 217.

Widow.

"Dependent," as used in the by-laws of a mutual benefit order providing for payment of the benefits to those "dependent" on the member, should be construed to mean some person or persons dependent for support, in some way on the deceased, and, where it appears that there is no other person so dependent on the deceased except the widow, the benefits should be paid to her, and not to the administrator of the deceased, by whom the money would be used to pay creditors of such deceased. Ballou v. Gile, 7 N. W. 561, 562, 50 Wis. 614.

"Dependent," as used in a statute giving a right of action to one "dependent" on a person whose death was caused by intoxicating liquors, should be construed to mean a legal dependency only, the same as though it read "to any one legally dependent." If it is given greater scope, there would be great difficulty in administering it. There would seem to be no stopping place short of including all possible cases of actual dependency, whatever the relation of the parties, and notwithstanding the absence of even a moral obligation to support. The law cannot determine what moral obligations are, and takes no cognizance of them, and, where an action is brought by one claiming to be the widow of such person, it is incumbent on her to prove that her marriage was lawful. Good v. Towns, 56 Vt. 410, 415, 48 Am. Rep. 799.

Under Rev. St. § 4707 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3246], providing that if a soldier has died entitled to a pension, and leaves neither widow nor minor children, his mother, father, or orphan sisters and brothers, if "dependent" on him at the time of his death, shall be entitled to the pension, a mother is dependent upon her son when she requires for her support the use of a farm in which he has an interest as heir. United States v. Purdy (U. S.) 38 Fed. 902.

DEPENDENT COVENANT.

"Dependent covenants" are covenants in which the performance of one depends on the prior performance of another. Chouteau v. Rice, 1 Minn. 106, 115 (Gil. 83, 93).

A "dependent covenant" is a covenant depending on the prior performance of some act or condition, and until the condition is performed the other party is not liable to an action on his covenant. Bailey v. White, 3 Ala. 330, 331.

A "dependent covenant" is an agreement to do or omit to do something which respects the thing on which it depends, and in contemplation of law it then forms a part of or appurtenance to the premises. It enters into their value if the covenant be on the side of the lessor, or the amount of the rent, which is itself a part of the land. Norman v. Wells (N. Y.) 17 Wend. 136, 149.

A "dependent covenant" is one which it is not the duty of the covenantor to perform until some other covenant contained in the same agreement has been performed by the opposite party. Where a person contracted to sell land for a certain sum in cash, and certain other land to be taken in part payment, the covenants in such contracts are dependent, the performance by one being the consideration of the performance by the other. Gray v. Smith (U. S.) 76 Fed. 525, 534.

Covenants are either dependent and concurrent, or mutual and independent. The first depends on the prior performance of some act or condition, and, until the condition is performed, the other party is not liable to an action on his covenant. In the second, mutual acts are to be performed at the same time, and if one party is ready and offers to perform his part, and the other neglects or refuses to perform his, he who is ready and offers has fulfilled his engagement, and may maintain an action for the default of the other's, though it is not certain that either is obliged to do the first act. The third sort is where either party may recover damages from the other for the injury he may have received for a breach of the covenants in his favor, and it is no excuse for the defendant to allege a breach of the covenant on the part of the plaintiff. Bailey v. White, 3 Ala. 330, 331.

The only cardinal rule in determining whether covenants are dependent or independent is to construe them according to the meaning of the parties and the good sense of the case. To ascertain that intention, the following general rules have been deduced from adjudged cases: (1) If a day be appointed for the performance of an act, and such day is to happen or may happen before the performance of the act which is the consideration for the first-mentioned act, then the covenants are considered mutual and independent, and an action may be brought without averring performance of the consideration; and so it is when no time is fixed for the performance of the consideration. (2) But when the day appointed for the payment of money or performance of an act is to happen after the thing which is the consideration is to be performed, no action can be maintained before performance of the condition. (3) Where a covenant goes only to part of the consideration on both sides, and a breach of such covenant may be paid for in damages, it is an independent covenant, and an action may be brought for a breach of the covenant without averring performance; and, when a person has received part of the consideration for which he entered into the agreement, the law obliges him to perform the agreement on his part, and leaves him to his remedy to recover damages for not receiving the whole consideration. (4) But where the mutual covenants go to the whole consideration on both sides, they are mutual conditions and dependent. (5) Where two acts are to be done at the same time, neither party can maintain an action without showing performance, or an offer to perform his part. Under these principles, where one party agreed to have certain land cleared and fenced as fast as the other party should require it to sow, and to have the bushes cleared off the land, and that if he failed to so clear and fence he should pay damages therefor, and the other agreed to pay a sum of money on a time fixed, action could be brought for the sum of money, although the land had not been cleared as fast as required for sowing, since it did not appear that the sowing was all to take place prior to the payment, since the covenant for damages showed an intention to rely on the covenants, and since a part of the consideration had been already received. Tompkins v. Elliot (N. Y.) 5 Wend. 493, 497.

DEPONENT.

A "deponent" is a witness; one who gives information, on oath or affirmation, respecting some fact known to him, before a magistrate; he who makes a deposition. 1 Bouv. Law Dict. 406. Richardson defines "depose," or, as the Scotch say, "depone," "to give evidence; bear witness or testimony." He defines "deponent" as "one who gives evidence, bears witness or testimony, so called, because the witness depones (deponit), places his hand upon the book of the Holy Evangelists, while he is bound by the obligation of an oath." It is thus seen that the word "depone," from which is derived "deponent," has relation to the mode in which the oath is administered, and not as to whether the testimony is delivered orally or reduced to writing. The word "witness" is a broader term, including deponents as well as affiants. Bliss v. Shuman, 47 Me. 248, 251, 252.

A deposition relating to a claim against a bankrupt, reciting that the members of a firm made oath that a bankrupt was justly and truly indebted to the "deponent" in a certain sum, and which was signed by one of the firm only, should be construed as referring to the person, and to that person alone, who makes the deposition; hence such deposition does not prove a firm debt. Meltzer v. Doll, 91 N. Y. 365, 371.

DEPORTATION.

Strictly speaking, "transportation, extradition, and deportation," although each has the effect of removing a person from a country, are different things and for different purposes. Transportation is by way of punishment of one convicted of offense against the laws of the country; extradition is the surrender to another country of one accused of an offense against its laws, there to be tried, and, if found guilty, punished; deportation is the removing of an alien out of the country simply because his presence is deemed inconsistent with the public welfare, and without any punishment being imposed or contemplated, either under the laws of the country out of which he is sent, or under those of the country to which he is taken. Fong Yue Ting v. United States, 13 Sup. Ct. 1016, 1020, 149 U. S. 698, 37 L. Ed. 905.

DEPOSE.

An indictment for perjury charging that the defendant did "depose" and swear does not imply that the defendant was sworn. To "depose" is merely to state or affirm some matter of fact in an affidavit or deposition, and this may be done as well before an oath is administered to the deponent as afterward. United States v. McConaughy (U. S.) 33 Fed. 168, 169.

Every written statement under oath or affirmation is embraced in the term "depose." Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 14; Pol. Code Mont. 1895, § 16; Code Civ. Proc. Cal. 1903, § 17; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 5135; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 2469; Pen. Code Cal. 1903, § 7; Code Civ. Proc. Mont. 1895, § 3463; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 2808; Pen. Code Mont. 1895, § 7; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 4662; Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 2498.

DEPOSIT.

"Deposit," as used in 1 Stat. 254, § 2, providing that it shall be the duty of every master or commander of a ship or vessel belonging to citizens of the United States, on his arrival at a foreign port, to deposit his register, sea letter, and Mediterranean passport with the consul, etc., carries with it something more than the mere delivery of the papers to the consul for redelivery in a few hours. This word is not usually employed except when the thing is intended to remain with the depositary for some time, and when the deposit is made for some specific object beyond that of mere inspection or examination. The papers should remain in the custody of such officer as long as the vessel remains in port. Toler v. White (U. S.) 24 Fed. Cas. 3, 5.

Where an insurance policy prohibited certain articles from being "deposited," stored, or kept in the insured building, the mere temporary presence of the articles was not a violation of its terms, a keeping of such goods permanently and for purposes of sale or storage being contemplated. Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Lawrence, 61 Ky. (4 Metc.) 9, 11, 12, 81 Am. Dec. 521.

"Deposited," as used in a bill of lading providing that the goods shall be taken from alongside by the consignee immediately after the vessel is ready to discharge, and, if not, they will be landed by the master and "deposited," at the expense of the consignee, on the dock or wharf or in the warehouse provided for that purpose, means placed either on the dock or in the warehouse, and not deposited in a warehouse on the dock. Goods may be deposited on the dock as well as in a warehouse. The meaning is that, if any expense attends either, the consignee is to pay it. The Egypt (U. S.) 25 Fed. 320, 323.

Intrusted or "deposited," as used in Rev. St. c. 109, § 4, providing that every person having any goods, effects, or credits of the principal defendant intrusted or deposited in his hands or possession may be summoned as trustee, means something more than mere possession. The mere possession of property by a party having no claim to hold it against the owner does not render him liable therefor as trustee. Stanleys v. Raymond, 58 Mass. (4 Cush.) 314, 316.

The term "deposit" in Act Feb. 28, 1803, § 2, providing that it shall be the duty of every master of a ship or vessel belonging to citizens of the United States, on his arrival at a foreign port, to deposit his register, sea letter, and Mediterranean passport with the consul, carries with it the idea of something more than the mere delivery of the papers to the consul for inspection, to redeliver in a few hours. This word is not usually employed except in cases where the thing is intended to remain with the depositary for some time, and when the deposit is made for some specific object beyond that of mere inspection and examination. Toler v. White (U. S.) 24 Fed. Cas. 3, 5.

As expose.

Rev. Laws, § 4191, makes it an offense for any one to maliciously expose any poisonous substance with the intent that the same shall be taken by any animal. Held that, where an indictment charged defendant with having deposited a poisonous substance, etc., the same was insufficient, the word "deposit" not being equivalent to "expose." The words are not synonymous. They not only do not mean the same thing, but are often used to express opposite ideas. Things are often deposited so as not to be exposed, and one word scarcely suggests the other. State v. Pratt, 54 Vt. 484, 485.

As file.

"Deposited," as used in Pen. Code, § 94, providing that a person who willfully and unlawfully removes, mutilates, destroys, conceals, or obliterates a record, map, book, paper, document, or other thing filed or "deposited" in a public office or with any public officer by authority of law, is punishable, etc., is not synonymous with or equivalent to "filed." "A paper is said to be 'filed' when it is delivered to the proper officer and by him received to be kept on file. And the derivation and meaning of the word, as defined in the dictionaries, carry with them the idea of permanent preservation, becoming part of the permanent records of the public office where it is filed. 'Deposit' does not carry with it the same meaning. It may or may not mean a permanent disposition of the thing placed or deposited. It may mean a mere temporary disposition or placing of the thing. And, the words of the statute being coupled together by the conjunction 'or,' the same meaning is not to be given to each, but that meaning or signification which distinguishes it from the other." People v. Peck, 22 N. Y. Supp. 576, 579, 67 Hun, 580.

As intrust.

"Deposited," as used in Rev. St. § 5468, declaring that the fact that a letter has been deposited in any authorized depository for mail matter, or in charge of any postmaster, or of any clerk, carrier, agent, or messenger of the postal service, shall be evidence that it was intended to be conveyed by mail, should be construed in the sense of "intrusted," and refers to mail matter left in any way for official transmission with an employé in the course of his employment. Walster v. United States (U. S.) 42 Fed. 891, 895.

DEPOSIT (Noun).

See "Affidavit of Deposit"; "Bank Deposit"; "Call Deposits"; "Certificate of Deposit"; "General Deposit"; "Gratuitous Deposit"; "Individual Deposits"; "Judicial Deposit"; "Naked Deposit"; "Necessary Deposit"; "On Deposit"; "Special Deposit"; "Specific Deposit."

"Deposit" is the delivery of a thing for custody, to be redelivered on demand without compensation, such as a deposit of securities or valuables in a bank for safe-keeping. National Bank of Ft. Edward v. Washington County Nat. Bank (N. Y.) 5 Hun, 605, 607.

A "deposit" is an act by which a person receives the property of another, binding himself to preserve it and return it in time. Civ. Code, art. 2926. In re Louisiana Savings Bank & Safe Deposit Co., 4 South. 301, 303, 40 La. Ann. 514.

Act June 4, 1879, providing that if any banker shall receive any deposits, when insolvent, whereby the deposit so made shall be lost to the depositor, the banker so receiving such deposit shall be deemed guilty of embezzlement, is broad enough to include, and does include, not only the total sum deposited, but also the constituent parts of such sum. Meadowcroft v. People (Ill.) 45 N. E. 991, 997.

Act June 16, 1836, § 22, providing that "deposits of money" belonging to a judgment debtor in any bank or with any person or body, corporate or politic, shall be liable to execution, should not be construed as applicable solely to transactions in which the relation of debtor and creditor between the depository and the depositor arises, but includes money left with a third person for safe-keeping, to be returned to the owner, not in money of like amount, but in the identical money left with him. Rozelle v. Rhodes, 9 Atl. 160, 162, 116 Pa. 129, 2 Am. St. Rep. 391.

A "deposit" is a receipt of money by a banker upon an engagement to repay the sum at the banking house when payment shall be called for there. It is not the bank's duty, as it is that of an ordinary debtor, to seek the creditor and pay him wherever found, but it is a condition precedent to its duty to repay that the depositor shall call upon it to do so at its banking house, and there is no default of the bank until such call is made. Tobias v. Morris, 28 South. 517, 520, 126 Ala. 535 (citing Downes v. Phoenix Bank, 6 Hill, 297, 299; Branch v. Dawson, 23 N. W. 552, 33 Minn. 399).

The terms of an auction sale of land calling simply for a "deposit" by the purchaser of a stated amount as earnest money are complied with by the delivery of a check satisfactory to the vendor or auctioneer. White v. Dahlquist Mfg. Co., 60 N. E. 791, 792, 179 Mass. 427.

The term "deposits," in Act March 25, 1824, providing that banks shall make a return of their condition to the Legislature, in which, among other things, shall be set forth their deposits, means money, current money received by the bank as such, and not old clothes or earrings, or, as in this case, a bundle sealed up and containing tide-water canal notes, the issuing of which had been interdicted, and in relation to which it would be a violation of duty of the bank to countenance and aid in their circulation. Lloyd v. West Branch Bank, 15 Pa. (3 Har.) 172, 175, 53 Am. Dec. 581.

Rev. St. § 3408, as amended by Act March 1, 1879, c. 125, provides that "deposits in . . . savings banks . . . shall be exempt from the tax on so much thereof as they have invested in securities of the United States . . . and on all deposits not exceeding $2,000." Held, that the meaning of the word "deposits," as last used, was equivalent to the terms "sums deposited," or "sums," the meaning being that neither deposits invested in United States securities, nor sums not exceeding $2,000 deposited in the name of any one person, should be taxed. German Sav. Bank v. Archbold, 104 U. S. 708, 709, 26 L. Ed. 901 (reversing [U. S.] 10 Fed. Cas. 260).

"Deposit" is a word of large and varied signification, and its meaning depends largely upon the character in which it is used. The word, as used in Pub. Laws, 145, defining embezzlement, prohibiting the receiving by a bank of money from a depositor, with knowledge that the bank is at the time insolvent, and providing that one guilty of so doing shall be guilty of embezzlement, has reference to such deposits as the banks are authorized to receive. Commonwealth v. Darlington, 8 Pa. Dist. R. 237.

The word "deposit," as used in Acts 17th Gen. Assem., c. 155, amending Code, § 912, allowing county treasurers to deposit county funds in the banks in the state, includes both special and general deposits, and, the latter being the more common, there is no sufficient ground for concluding that the Legislature intended to exclude them from the operation of the act. Caldwell v. King, 50 N. W. 975, 976, 84 Iowa, 228.

V. S. 582-584, requires savings banks and trust companies to pay a certain state tax on their individual deposits exceeding in the aggregate a certain sum. Held, that the word "deposit" did not mean deposits in the ordinary sense, but included securities held as a part of the trust fund by such bank. Montpellier Sav. Bank & Trust Co. v. City of Montpellier, 50 Atl. 1117, 73 Vt. 364.

As used in Tenn. Acts 1879, c. 166, § 1, entitled "An act to prevent the sale of cotton between sunset and sunrise," and providing that it shall not be lawful to sell, buy, barter or exchange, or receive on deposit any cotton between the hours of sunset of one day and the hours of sunrise of the next day, the phrase "or receive on deposit" is used in connection with sale, barter, and exchange, and signifies a step in their accomplishment. The phrase means to receive on deposit with a view to sell, and, as a step taken, to put the article on the market, so that the usual definitions of "deposit" cannot control. Truss v. State, 81 Tenn. (13 Lea) 311, 313.

A deposit, in general, is an act by which a person receives the property of another, binding himself to preserve it and return it in kind. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 2926.

As assets.

Pub. St. c. 13, § 20, provides for the imposition of a tax on savings banks, to be paid semiannually on the average amount of deposits for the six months preceding. Held, that the word "deposits" as there used was not synonymous with "assets," but meant the amounts with which the bank was charged on its books as received from depositors, and did not include any particular part of the investments of the bank; hence it could not be said that the bank was taxable as on deposits for a guaranty fund and for undivided profits. Suffolk Sav. Bank v. Commonwealth, 23 N. E. 728, 729, 151 Mass. 103.

When a deposit is made, the ownership of the money passes to the bank and becomes part of its assets. In exchange therefor there accrues to the depositor, by force of the contract of deposit, an indebtedness against the bank to the extent of the amount deposited. So that, in a statute exempting from taxation the deposits in any bank for savings which he had deposited, the word "deposit" will not be held to mean the money received by the bank, or the securities into which it has been converted; so that an exemption extends to the bank alone, and will be held to mean the debt which is due the depositor under the contract of deposit. People v. Dederick, 54 N. Y. Supp. 519, 520, 35 App. Div. 29.

As a bailment.

A "deposit" is defined to be a naked bailment of goods, to be kept without recompense, and to be returned when the bailor shall require it. Bellevue Falls Bank v. Rutland County Bank, 40 Vt. 377, 380; Payne v. Gardiner, 29 N. Y. 146, 167; Wilson v. Prosser (Pa.) 5 Kulp, 471. In the case of deposits with a banker, the relation of the banker with the depositor is that of debtor and creditor, and does not partake of a fiduciary character. In re Cobb (U. S.) 96 Fed. 821, 824.

A "deposit" is a form of bailment in which the principal object of the parties is the custody of the thing bailed, and the services and labor to be performed in connection therewith are a mere accessory thereto. Thompson v. Woodruff, 47 Tenn. (7 Cold.) 401, 407.

A "deposit" is defined to be a bailment of goods to be kept by the bailee without reward, and delivered according to the object or purpose of the original trust. Montgomery v. Evans, 8 Ga. 178, 180.

When chattels are delivered by one person to another, to keep for the use of the bailor, it is called a "deposit." Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 2921.

As capital stock.

The term "deposits," as used in a statute providing that every institution for savings incorporated under the laws of the commonwealth should pay a tax of $\frac{1}{2}$ of 1 per cent. per annum on the amount of its deposits, means the sums received by the institution from depositors, without regard to the nature of the funds. They are not capital stock in any sense, nor are they even investments. Provident Institution v. Massachusetts, 73 U. S. (6 Wall.) 611, 627, 18 L. Ed. 907; Home Ins. Co. v. State of New York, 10 Sup. Ct. 593, 597, 134 U. S. 594, 33 L. Ed. 1025.

Commercial deposit.

A savings bank was allowed to receive money on deposit or in trust at such rate of interest or on such terms as may be agreed upon, the rate of interest to be allowed for the deposits not to exceed the legal rate. It kept deposits for savings and investment, and in addition thereto it kept with business men commercial deposits, which are strictly commercial accounts, such as are kept by national banks. Such deposits are subject to be withdrawn at sight, and the depositor receives no interest thereon. By V. S. 583, it was provided that every trust company or savings bank shall pay a certain tax upon the average amount of its deposit, and it was contended that the amount "deposited," as used in the charter, did not have reference to the commercial deposits, but referred solely to deposits of savings, or to such as are interest-bearing, and, as used in tax laws, it did not include commercial deposits as a basis of taxation. But it was held that under the provisions of the charter the rate of interest and terms on which the bank may agree to receive money on deposit are within its discretion, and that this language is broad enough to permit the rest of the money on deposit upon terms as to interest from the legal interest down to without interest, and upon such terms regarding payment as the parties may expressly and impliedly agree, and hence the word, "deposit" would include commercial deposits as well. State v. Franklin County Sav. Bank & Trust Co., 52 Atl. 1069, 1070, 74 Vt. 246.

General and special deposit distinguished.

Deposits of money in a bank are either general or special. A "general deposit" is one which is to be repaid on demand in money, and the title to the money deposited passes to the bank; a "special deposit" is one in which the depositor is entitled to the return of the identical thing deposited, and the title remains in the depositor. Bank of Blackwell v. Dean, 60 Pac. 226, 9 Okl. 626.

All deposits made with banks may be divided into two classes, namely, those in which the bank becomes bailee of the depositor, the title to the thing remaining with the latter, and that other kind of deposit of money, peculiar to banking business, in which the depositor for his own convenience parts with the title to his money and loans it to the bank, and the latter, in consideration of the loan of the money and the right to use it for its own profits, agrees to refund the same amount, or any part thereof, on demand. Shipman v. Bank of the State of New York, 13 N. Y. Supp. 475, 486, 59 Hun. 621. See, also, Montagu v. Pacific Bank (U. S.) 81 Fed. 602, 604 (citing Marine Bank v. Fulton County Bank, 69 U. S. [2 Wall.] 252, 256, 17 L. Ed. 785).

A deposit "is an act by which a person receives the property of another, binding himself to preserve and return it. There is a distinction in deposits. Where the very silver and gold deposited is to be restored, the transaction is a 'special' or 'pure' deposit; but where the party is to restore not the identical coin, but only an equivalent on demand, it is a 'loan' or 'irregular deposit.'" State v. Clark, 4 Ind. 315, 316.

"A 'deposit,' properly so called, is a naked bailment, and exists where one of the contracting parties gives something to the other to keep, who is to do so gratuitously, and obliges himself to return it in individuo when he shall be requested. When one deposits money with another for safe-keeping, the latter to return, not the specific money, but an equal sum, the transaction is also called a 'deposit,' but it is an irregular deposit." Rozelle v. Rhodes, 9 Atl. 160, 162, 116 Pa. 129, 2 Am. St. Rep. 591.

A bank deposit is general unless the depositor makes it special, or deposits it expressly in some particular capacity. Brahm v. Adkins, 77 Ill. 263, 264.

As a loan.

Originally a "deposit" of money was made by placing a sum of money in gold or silver with a bank or other depositary, to be returned, when called for, in the same identical coin, and without interest, the depositor paying the depositary a compensation for his care. For more than a century, however, prior to the passage of Laws 1831, c. 178, for the incorporation and establishment of banks, the term "deposit" had come to mean quite a different transaction. It became customary to deposit money for a particular period and on interest, or payable at certain prescribed periods after notice; in short, the term "deposit" became a symbolical word to designate not only a deposit in its original sense, but all that class of contracts where money in any of its forms, as specie or bank bills, was placed in the hands of banks or bankers to be returned in other money on call, or at a specified period, and with or without interest. The transaction, as designated in the figurative use of the term, was in reality the same as a "loan" of money when it occurred between individuals. Curtis v. Leavitt, 15 N. Y. 9, 166.

Originally, a "deposit" was a thing delivered for gratuitous safe-keeping, and it remained the property of the owner; but it is now used to designate a certain kind of loan, for money deposited in the ordinary way becomes the property of the bank or banker. Such loans always imply that the money on deposit is lying in the bank on hand ready to meet the demand of the owner, and that it is kept there for convenience. State Sav. Bank v. Foster, 76 N. W. 499, 500, 118 Mich. 268, 42 L. R. A. 404.

A "deposit" is where a sum of money is left with a banker for safe-keeping, subject to order, and payable, not in the specific money deposited, but in an equal sum. It may or it may not bear interest, according to the agreement. While the relation between the depositor and banker is that of debtor and creditor, the transaction cannot in any proper sense be regarded as a loan, unless the money is left, not for safe-keeping, but for a fixed period at interest, in which case the transaction assumes the characteristics of a loan. Hunt v. Hopley, 95 N. W. 205, 206, 120 Iowa, 695 (citing In re Law's Estate, 144 Pa. 499, 22 Atl. 831, 14 L. R. A. 103; State v. McFetridge, 84 Wis. 473, 54 N. W. 998, 20 L. R. A. 223). A "deposit" is a temporary disposition of money for safe-keeping, and this temporary nature makes it distinguishable from an investment, which carries with it a greater or less degree of permanency. In re Law's Estate, 22 Atl. 831, 832, 144 Pa. 499, 14 L. R. A. 103. There is a distinction between a general deposit of money in a bank, payable at any time on demand, and an investment of such money. By such a deposit the depositor does not lose control of the money, but may reclaim it at any time. He loses control of the specific coin or currency deposited, but not of an equal amount of coin or currency having the same qualities and value; but if funds are invested in United States or state bonds, or in loans on time to counties, cities, etc., control thereof is lost, and the same cannot be replaced until such bonds are paid or sold, or such loans become due and are collected by due course of law. The retention of substantial control over the funds in the one case, and the loss of such control in the other, mark the leading distinction between a mere "deposit" of the funds of a state in the hands of its treasurer, and an "investment" thereof, as those terms are used in the statutes relating thereto. State v. McFetridge, 54 N. W. 1, 11, 84 Wis. 473, 20 L. R. A. 223. Where a state treasurer places state funds in a national bank subject to check, the bank giving security therefor and agreeing to pay interest on daily balances, the transaction is a deposit, and not a loan. Nebraska v. First Nat. Bank (U. S.) 88 Fed. 947, 948.

A deposit made by one bank with another is a loan. It is well known that country banks keep on deposit in New York with bankers and merchants a considerable amount of money for their own convenience, for which they receive more or less interest. But whether interest be obtained or not, these deposits are, equally with paper discounted over the counter of the bank, loaned money. The banker is accountable for the deposits he receives as a debtor, and the individual borrower of money from the bank sustains no other relation to it. In both cases money is borrowed to be returned in a greater or less period of time, according to the contract of the parties. First Nat. Bank v. Lanier, 78 U. S. (11 Wall.) 369, 375, 20 L. Ed. 172.

A "deposit" was originally a thing delivered to a person for gratuitous safe-keeping, which remained the property of the owner. The word, however, is now used to designate a certain kind of loan. For money deposited in the ordinary way becomes the property of the bank, and the deposit is a debt. In re Patterson (N. Y.) 18 Hun, 221, 222.

Deposits are regarded as loans to the bank without interest, and the money goes into the general fund, and is used by the bank for its own benefit in its usual financial operations. The bank thus gets the benefit of the loan of the depositor's money, and, as a compensation to the depositor, there is an implied obligation on the part of the bank to honor and pay on presentation the checks and drafts of the customer until his deposit is exhausted. The deposit creates a debt, which is discharged pro tanto by the payment of the depositor's checks. Neal v. First Nat. Bank, 60 N. E. 164, 166, 26 Ind. App. 503 (citing Boyden v. Bank of Cape Fear, 65 N. C. 13; Himstedt v. Bank, 46 Ark. 537; Perley v. Muskegon County, 32 Mich. 132, 20 Am. Rep. 637; McLain v. Wallace, 103 Ind. 562, 5 N. E. 911).

A "deposit" was clearly defined in Payne v. Gardiner, 29 N. Y. 146, 168, and Pothier was quoted with approval as follows: "Where a man deposits money in the hands of another to be kept for his use, the possession of the custodian ought to be deemed the possession of the owner, until an application and refusal or other denial of right." It is further said that a distinction exists between a mere "loan" and a "deposit." They are governed by different rules. Thus, where a wife received money as proceeds of a sale of her separate property, and paid the proceeds over to her husband, and there was evidence that he had made statements that she had given him the money to care for, such transaction constituted a "deposit." Dorman v. Gannon, 38 N. Y. Supp. 659, 661, 4 App. Div. 458.

An administrator is chargeable with money of his decedent deposited in a bank then solvent, taking therefor a certificate of deposit payable after one year, with interest, and which money was lost by the subsequent insolvency of the bank, as the transaction is a loan, and not a deposit subject to be withdrawn at any time. Appeal of Baer (Pa.) 18 Atl. 1.

Surplus.

Laws 1896, c. 908, § 4, subd. 14, exempting the "deposits" in any bank for savings which are due depositors, means the total amount received for which the bank is accountable, and not merely the identical moneys received from particular depositors, and includes the surplus which has accumulated, it being a fund which represents the original deposits, and its creation being authorized in contemplation that it may be used to repay to the depositors the amounts put in by them. People v. Peck, 51 N. E. 412, 414, 157 N. Y. 51.

DEPOSIT IN COURT.

"Deposited in court," as used in 1 St. 625, c. 119, providing that in all cases of admiralty jurisdiction the clerk of the District Court shall be entitled to a certain percentage on all moneys deposited in court, means money which is deposited subject to the order of the court, whether it be in the actual possession of the court or a bank, or of an officer of the court. It is not limited to money brought in and deposited, sedente curia, in the actual manual possession of the court. It includes money deposited in the bank subject to the order of the court. Ex parte Prescott (U. S.) 19 Fed. Cas. 1283, 1285.

DEPOSIT FOR EXCHANGE.

A "deposit for exchange" is one in which the depositary is only bound to return a thing corresponding in kind to that which is deposited. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 1818; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4005; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1357; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 2829.

DEPOSIT FOR HIRE.

A deposit not gratuitous is called "storage." A deposit in such case is called a "deposit for hire." Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 1851.

DEPOSIT FOR KEEPING.

A "deposit for keeping" is one in which the depositary is bound to return the identical thing deposited. Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 2828; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4004; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1356; Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 1817.

DEPOSIT SLIP.

A "deposit slip" made out by the cashier of a bank is considered merely a note to help the memory. First Nat. Bank v. City Nat. Bank, 76 S. W. 489, 102 Mo. App. 357.

DEPOSITARY.

See "Legal Depositary."

A voluntary deposit is made by one giving to another, with his consent, the possession of personal property, to keep for the benefit of the former or a third party. The person giving it is called the "depositor," and the person receiving it the "depositary." Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1353; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 2825; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4001.

DEPOSITARY FOR HIRE.

The depositary in the case of a deposit which is not gratuitous is called a "depositary for hire." Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 2490.

When chattels are delivered by one person to another to keep for the use of the bailor, the depositary receiving or expecting a reward or hire is called a "depositary for hire." Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 2921.

A deposit not gratuitous is called "storage." The depositary in such case is called a "depositary for hire." Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 2849; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4024; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1376.

A voluntary deposit is made by one giving to another, with his consent, the possession of personal property to keep for the benefit of the former or of a third party. The person giving is called the "depositor," and the person receiving the "depositary." Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4001; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1353.

DEPOSITION.

A "deposition" is the testimony of a witness, put or taken down in writing, under oath or affirmation before a commissioner, examiner, or other judicial officer, in answer to interlocutory and cross-interlocutory, and usually subscribed by the witness. Lutcher v. United States (U. S.) 72 Fed. 968, 972, 19 C. C. A. 259.

The word "deposition," in common parlance, is often used to designate the document containing the interrogatories, answers, and certificate of the magistrate; while, again, it more appropriately designates the narrative of the witness made under the sanction of an oath and reduced to writing. Fuller v. Hodgden, 25 Me. (12 Shep.) 243, 246.

The ordinary and usual meaning of the word "deposition" is confined to written testimony. United States v. Clark (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 441, 442.

Depositions are species of evidence, in suits at law, altogether unknown to the common law. They are not used in England and many of our sister states. They are, moreover, a species of evidence of a most unsatisfactory character, and should always be received with the utmost caution. Winooskie Turnpike v. Ridley, 8 Vt. 404, 405, 30 Am. Dec. 476.

Depositions are at best an inferior kind of evidence, and not to be encouraged beyond the limits of absolute necessity. Where, therefore, a party desiring to avail himself of this sort of evidence might have had it taken in a way more conducive to fairness as respects his adversary, the court ought to require a better excuse for the admission than attention to his own convenience. Gordon v. Little (Pa.) 8 Serg. & R. 533, 556, 11 Am. Dec. 632.

Code Cr. Proc. art. 774, declares that the "deposition" of a witness taken before an examining court or a jury of inquest, and reduced to writing and certified according to law, in cases where the defendant was present and had the privilege of cross-examining the witness, may be read in evidence, as is provided for the reading of "depositions." Held, that the word "deposition" in the beginning of such section was a manifest error, and should be construed to mean "testimony" or "evidence." Kerry v. State, 17 Tex. App. 178, 182, 50 Am. Dec. 122.

Primarily, a "deposition" is simply written testimony. It is testimony that is deposited or laid down in writing. A legal deposition, according to Bouvier, is the testimony of a witness reduced to writing, in due form of law, by virtue of the commission or other authority of a competent tribunal, or, according to the provision of some statute law, to be used on the trial of some question of fact in a court of justice. In Troy Iron & Nail Factory v. Corning (U. S.) 24 Fed. Cas. 236, it was said by Nelson, J., that it is testimony taken out of court under an authority which will entitle it to be read as evidence in court, and has no relation to oral testimony taken in court or before a master. Indianapolis Water Co. v. American Strawboard Co. (U. S.) 65 Fed. 534, 535.

The term "deposition," although sometimes used as synonymous with "affidavit" or "oath," in its strict and appropriate sense is limited to the written testimony of a witness given in the course of a judicial proceeding, either at law or in equity. State v. Dayton, 23 N. J. Law (3 Zab.) 54, 53 Am. Dec. 270. In jurisprudence, says Abbot, the principal use of the term is to signify the testimony of a witness when given in answer to interrogatories propounded by a person authorized for the purpose, and officially taken down in writing. The Sallie P. Linderman (U. S.) 22 Fed. 557, 558.

At a preliminary examination for a magistrate, the justice appointed the plaintiff to report in shorthand the proceedings at the preliminary investigation, and, in an action to recover for his services and for transcribing the evidence, it was contended that the county was liable, in that the statute made it the duty of the magistrate to indorse in writing his order of discharge upon the "depositions" taken, etc., and hence such depositions were necessary, and a part of the legitimate costs of the preliminary examination; but the court held that the name "deposition" is used to designate the testimony taken by the magistrate when the complaint is presented to him before the issuance of the warrant, as well as the testimony of witnesses taken upon the examination of the accused after arrest, and that the order of discharge may properly be indorsed upon the former. Thus Pen. Code, § 811, provides that, when an information is laid before a magistrate, he must examine the informant and any witnesses, and take their depositions in writing. Then section 812 prescribes what the deposition as taken must set forth. The term "deposition" is also given to the testimony taken upon the examination of the accused, and section 870 speaks of depositions on the information or on the examination. Mattingly v. Nichols, 65 Pac. 748, 133 Cal. 332.

The testimony of a witness taken by a judge in the form of a deposition, and reduced to writing by a stenographer, but not read over to or corrected or signed by the witness or certified by the judge, does not constitute a "deposition" within the requirements of the Code. Thomas v. Black, 23 Pac. 1037, 1038, 84 Cal. 221.

An affidavit that on a certain page of a bill of exceptions a space was left for depositions, and "such depositions" were placed inside of said bill of exceptions at said point, but not otherwise fastened, will be construed to mean the original depositions, and not copies. Pennsylvania Co. v. Sears, 36 N. E. 353, 354, 136 Ind. 460.

"Deposition," as used in Code Cr. Proc. 1879, art. 774, providing that the deposition of a witness taken before an examining court or a jury of inquest, and reduced to writing and certified, may be read in evidence, authorizes the use only of depositions taken in such cases, and does not authorize the reading in evidence by the state of testimony given by a witness before such examining court. Cline v. State, 36 Tex. Cr. R. 320, 369, 36 S. W. 1099, 61 Am. St. Rep. 850.

On the taxation of costs in an equity case in the federal court, the fee of $2.50 on each deposition taken and admitted in evidence on the hearing before the court is taxable under Rev. St. § 824, providing a fee, for each deposition taken and admitted in a cause, in favor of the party recovering costs, and it is immaterial before what officer the deposition was taken, whether examiner, master, or otherwise. Ferguson v. Dent (U. S.) 46 Fed. 88, 90, 91.

Under Rev. St. § 824, allowing fees for "depositions" taken, the testimony of each witness is a deposition, especially where the testimony of each witness is taken separately. Broyles v. Buck (U. S.) 37 Fed. 137, 138.

A deposition is a written declaration under oath, made upon notice to the adverse party. Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 5262; Rev. St. Wyo. 1899, § 3704.

A deposition is a written declaration under oath, made upon notice to the adverse party, for the purpose of enabling him to attend and cross-examine. Code Civ. Proc. Cal. 1903, § 2004; Ann. Codes & St. Or. 1901, § 816.

A deposition is a written declaration under oath, made on notice to the adverse party, for the purpose of enabling him to attend and cross-examine, or upon written interrogatories. Ann. St. Ind. T. 1899, § 2027; Gen. St. Kan. 1901, § 4790; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 5667; Code Civ. Proc. S. D. 1903, § 505; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 4529.

Affidavit.

Deposition, "in its proper technical sense, is limited to the written testimony of a witness in the course of a judicial proceeding either at law or in equity." Bouvier. It is, however, sometimes used, both in common parlance and legislative enactments as synonymous with "affidavit" or "oath," and is thus defined by Webster. State v. Dayton, 23 N. J. Law (3 Zab.) 49, 54, 53 Am. Dec. 270.

The word "deposition" may be used in two senses. In its restricted and technical sense it is usually limited to the written testimony of a witness given in the course of a judicial proceeding at law or in equity, but it is also a generic expression, which embraces all written evidence verified by oath, and thus includes affidavits; and, as used in the Political Code of Georgia, authorizing a commissioner of the state, residing in another state, to administer oaths and to take certified acknowledgments of depositions under commission or otherwise, the word "deposition" will be held to include affidavit, this being rendered the more proper construction owing to the fact that he is authorized by the language to certify acknowledgments of depositions not taken under a commission by the use of the words "or otherwise." Baker v. Magrath, 32 S. E. 370, 371, 106 Ga. 419.

The word "deposition" includes affidavits, and is so used in the provision that the making of a deposition or certificate is deemed to be complete, within the provision of the chapter relating to perjury, from the time when it is delivered by the accused to any other person with intent that it be uttered or published as true. People v. Robles, 49 Pac. 1042, 117 Cal. 681.

An "affidavit" is a written declaration under oath, made without notice to the adverse party. Civ. Code Proc. § 3321. A "deposition" is a written declaration on oath, made upon notice to the adverse party, for the purpose of enabling him to attend and cross-examine. Both affidavit and deposition are declarations under oath, and a distinction recognized by the court between the two is simply for the purpose of preserving the right of cross-examination. So that in a probate proceeding, where there is no adverse party, an affidavit will be treated as a deposition. In re Liter's Estate, 48 Pac. 753, 756, 19 Mont. 474.

"Deposition" is a generic term, embracing all written evidence verified by oath, and thus includes affidavits; but in legal language a distinction is maintained in courts of law and chancery between 'depositions' and 'affidavits.' A 'deposition' is evidence given by a witness under interrogatives, oral or written, and usually written down by an official person; while an 'affidavit' is the mere voluntary act of the party making the oath, and may be, and generally is, taken without the cognizance of the one against whom it is used." Stimpson v. Brooks (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 100.

An affidavit is a voluntary ex parte statement, formally reduced to writing, and sworn to or confirmed before some officer authorized by law to take it. The distinction between an "affidavit" and a "deposition" is that the former is ex parte voluntary, and the latter is made after notice, and is compulsory. If the witness is subpoenaed, sworn, and required to answer, his evidence, reduced to writing, is his "deposition." Crenshaw v. Miller (U. S.) 111 Fed. 450, 452; Woods v. State, 33 N. E. 901, 903, 184 Ind. 85.
